The Boston Symphony Orchestra needs a new conductor. How about Landon Ronald? That English musician conducted a symphony in Berlin, the other day and here are some of the verdicts: Wrote the Berliner Morgenpost: Mr. Ronald's magnificent interpretation of Tchaikovsky's symphony in F minor ranks him among our greatest conductors, like Weingartner, Mahler, and Nikisch." According to Die Zeit the performance of the same symphony "completely overshadowed the best rendering under Nikisch, the established interpreter of the composer." "Never have I heard a better rendering of this composition," said the critic of the Volkszeitung. "A quite ideal interpretation," was the verdict of Deutsche Worte, while other judgments seem to have been equally enthusiastic in tone.

n STAATS ZEITUNG,

ress New York City.

Bostoner in Brooklyn. Auch mit dem gestrigen, dem vierten in der diesjährigen Serie der „Instituts"-Konzerte errang das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester und dessen genialer Leiter Dr. Karl Muck einen großen Erfolg. Der Baptist Temple war bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt mit Zuhörern, deren Beifall sich von Nummer zu Nummer steigerte. Mit dem Orchester theilte sich der Violinist Fritz Kreisler, der Lalo's Spanische Symphonie meisterhaft zu Gehör brachte, in die Ehren des Abends. Die Kapelle spielte Piecen von MacDowell, dem kürzlich verstorbenen Komponisten, sowie von Bizet und Goldmark.

EVENING SUN,

ess New York City.

FEB 8

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra walks out of Carnegie Hall late this afternoon, the New York Symphony Orchestra will walk in. Walter Damrosch's Wagner programme of to-night and to-morrow afternoon remains as announced last week. Nordica's name, omitted to-day, still leads the Beethoven cycle on March 1.

Sousa's Band at the Hippodrome to-morrow night will have three soloists, Lucy Allen, soprano; Jeannette Powers, violin, and Joseph Norrito, clarinet. There are nine numbers on the bill, including three by Mr. Sousa, and among these his latest march, "Powhatan's Daughter."

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 23 1904

Crochets and Quavers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brooklyn last Friday afternoon at the Baptist Temple, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist. Next Thursday evening Mme. Gadski will give a song recital in the same place.

ork, 1884

NEW YORK AMERICAN, s New York City.

arch 3.

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Muck has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way by placing many of their works on his programme in Boston and elsewhere. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music.

n EVENING SUN,

ress New York City.

e

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Troy, N. Y. When they read how everything from ice to automobiles grounded there, the Athenians of the Hub of the Universe said, "We'll show it's easy." Which same they did.

The last opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck's direction will be given at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon. Immediately after the Washington concert Dr. Muck will leave for Berlin, where it is likely he will remain indefinitely.

N.Y. Eve. Sun - Feb. 24

REGER'S CENTURY OPUS IN A WHIRLWIND FINISH.

MacDowell Day Sees the Men of Boston Take the Plunge by Tube to Brooklyn, with Stop Watch in Hand, While the People's Symphony Concerts Cherish MacDowell Memory Here—Manhattan Opera Has a Day of Rest and Miss Garden's Compliments to All—Mr. Conried Tells of Historic Pageant for His Opera Benefit—Caruso and Tetrazzini Rivals Again To-night.

Max Reger, the Bach of Bavaria, the flaming youth who first saw light on March 19, 1873, in a town of the fire-bringers well called Brand, and who was saved from the burning of Parisian Debussy or Münchener Strauss by retiring, like the classic Goethe, to old Cantor Bach's own Leipsic, has at last had his day in New York. Right on the heels of a poet's quaint melodrama, there came the hundredth opus of this equally extraordinary man and ardent suitor of old modes. No other man living, it is admitted to-day, could have composed that splendid fugue which wound up a very bad forty minutes of "variations" in Carnegie Hall last night, and which not only held half a tardy audience standing all that time, but also brought Karl Muck and the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra upstanding amid a riot of cheers at the whirlwind finish.

Yes, the musical heavens are hung with fiddles yet. The public has heard nothing since "Meistersinger" to compare with the Reger fugue. Possibly those second and eighth and especially eleventh variations deserved their honorable mention. But variation as an art form is dead and dryasdust. It is not better, but worse, when done by Bach and Beethoven, Handel and Haydn, than it is by Elgar, D'Indy and the boys. It was only worth while last night as the structure on which that soaring fugue was to be reared. When the basses took and held the foundation tone or organ point, when the two fugal themes were tossed and flung to the skies on a maze of strings, and when that original "merry theme" of an old man Hiller's opera literally blew the heads off all the trombones in one glad sweet song, it was no wonder the impossible happened.

So Dr. Muck's first and only great novelty here set our steadiest audience into riot. If another analogy to current opera events was desired, here was also an enterprise promoted by one man alone. Major Higginson of Boston does not blow his own horn. A nation deafened by more screaming aspirants for fame only hears indirectly, once in a while, how the capitalist who paid his $20,000 a year for this Boston Orchestra during a score of years is able to send it rejoicing on the road to the tune of a quarter million of gross receipts each year.

Fritz Kreisler's own fugue, in his own first cadenza to the Beethoven violin concerto, had another riot last evening. As his double-stopping digits played tag with old Beethoven themes up and down that $15,000 Strad, he set even the stern Boston fiddlers smiling. An imported violin star was the greatest novelty to the virtuoso band. The programme was over-long, but a real Bach suite after Reger was cleverly thought of and gloriously played.

After rehearsing with Van Rooy this morning for to-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinée, the Bostonians grasped their music luggage and stop-watches firmly in hand and took their first plunge by tube to Brooklyn. Manager Comee, who went ahead, telephoned them that they could do it in sixteen minutes straight. They used to allow an hour.

MacDowell's "Autumn" suite, leads the Brooklyn programme. His "Indian" suite, in part, was also played at the Cooper Union last night, and will be repeated to-night in Carnegie Hall, as a last tribute of the People's Symphony concerts of this town.

Dr. Muck, it is announced, on his farewell trip to New York next month, will play one all-American programme.

OMEIKE" NEW YORK.

PUBLIC

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

ddress

te FEB 1908

DR. MUCK AND AMERICANS

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Doctor Muck has evidenced his admiration of American composers and his desire to give them a fighting chance in a substantial way by placing many of their works on his programmes. Last year the Boston Orchestra played music by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Payne and Strube. This year Doctor Muck has already played Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "Pagen Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite" and his second piano concerto, together with Schelling's "Suite Fantastiques." In the near future Doctor Muck announces the Jeanne d'Arc music by Converse, a repetition of MacDowell's "Indian Suite," from the programmes of the previous season; a new symphony by Henry Hadley, and violin and orchestra numbers by Gustav Strube. One of the March concerts in New York will be devoted to a programme, made up entirely of the music of our native composers.

[154]

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTIS

Address New York City.

FEB 20 19

Date

WILLEM MENGELBERG, the conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, and one of the most prominent of the "star conductors" of Europe, we learn through private sources has not yet made any arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of that organization for next season. Rumor has been busy with Mengelberg's name as the most probable successor of Dr. Muck, though some insist that Nikisch has been secured, and the management of the Boston orchestra itself denies that any one has as yet been decided on. Meantime there are those who believe that the next conductor will be an obscure young man who is unknown in America and who will achieve fame, if fame he achieves, through his work with this orchestra, as Gericke, Nikisch, and Paur did before him. It will be remembered that Dr. Muck is the only conductor of great previous reputation who has undertaken the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mengelberg is not unknown in New York. Two seasons ago he conducted a pair of concerts for the Philharmonic Society, at which he presented as the pièce de résistance Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben," with notable success. Since his visit to America Mengelberg's fame has increased steadily. Not long ago he enjoyed the unique distinction of conducting in rapid succession a concert each for the Colonne Orchestra and the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris. Besides the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, he regularly conducts an orchestra at Frankfort-on-the-Main. When in this country Mengelberg went to Boston to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he afterward publicly ranked it with the two or three foremost orchestras of Europe. In private conversation he did not hesitate to say that he personally had never heard an orchestra so good.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

n

ress

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Appreciative Audience Hears Excellent Program at Lyric.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at the Lyric under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist. The following was the program:

Beethoven—
Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.
I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
IV. Shepherd's song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy—
Concerto in E minor for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.

Richard Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

To make the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony almost a revelation after the many years during which it has been played requires an orchestra of the finest material, a number of instrumental soloists who are practically perfect on their instruments, and a director of the highest musical intelligence. All these were present in the Boston Symphony performance last evening, and Beethoven's beautiful work was faithfully set out.

The Pastoral Symphony has not been regarded as Beethoven's greatest work, but, like his one opera, "Fidelio," it is his one work entirely of its own kind. It is program music that is not ashamed of itself, and therefore makes no apologies to the public. In the fifth symphony Beethoven had let nature speak for herself in her tragic mood— that of unconquerable destiny. But in the sixth he permits nature to tell her happy story in the forests and by the brookside, in the merry-makings of the peasants and in the gladness of all human gratitude.

With any second-class conductor the ruin of the sixth symphony is a forgone conclusion; but with a great conductor like Dr. Muck it is an unsurpassed work of art, in which nature's own moods are presented audibly in musical notes. The entire audience last evening manifested its delight in comprehending the great masterpiece as the listeners never did before.

Mr. Kreisler's success in the Mendelssohn violin-concerto was fully expected and was complete. He was recalled half a dozen times, but the Boston Orchestra very properly does not allow encores. The concert closed with the Richard Strauss tone-picture of "Till Eulenspiegel and His Merry Pranks." The entire performance was one of the best by this unrivaled organization.

rom HERALD

ddress

ate FEB 23 1905

The last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the New National Tuesday afternoon, March 7, at 4:30 promptly.

ress _____

Feb. 29, 1908

Musik.

Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters.

Kreisler als Solist.

Seitdem der auch in Europa hochgeschätzte amerikanische Komponist MacDowell gestorben und die undankbare Nachwelt auf die künstlerische Bedeutung ihres Landsmannes aufmerksam gemacht worden ist, erscheinen seine Kompositionen häufiger auf den Konzert-Programmen und finden bei dem amerikanischen Publikum eine hohe Anerkennung, die stark mit Patriotismus vermischt ist.

So hatte das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter der bekannten vortrefflichen Leitung des genialen Dr. Karl Muck, in seinem letzten Freitags-Konzerte in Brooklyn als erste Nummer die A-moll Suite von Mac Dowell auf das Programm gesetzt, und das überfüllte Haus konnte sich nicht genug thun, immer wieder und wieder in Beifall am Schlusse der gefälligen Komposition auszubrechen. Das Werk besteht aus fünf Theilen und jedem ist ein erklärender Titel vorgesetzt worden, der dem Gedankengang des Hörers eine bestimmte Richtung anweisen soll. Also Programm-Musik! Der erste Theil soll uns in einen verzauberten Wald führen, in dem allerlei Geister und Spukgestalten ihr Wesen treiben, der zweite soll uns ein „Sommeridyll" vor die Seele führen, der dritte betitelt sich kurzweg „Im Oktober", der vierte „Gesang der Schäferin" und der letzte wieder führt uns in den Wald zurück, denn er ist mit der Marke „Waldgeister" ausgestattet worden.

Ich meine nun, daß die Suite weit besser fahren würde, wenn man diese ganz willkürlichen Bezeichnungen der einzelnen Theile einfach fortlaen würde, denn einmal zwingen sie den Zuhörer in bestimmte Vorstellungen hinein, die sich nicht recht mit der Musik decken wollen, und dann fordern sie den Vergleich mit Kompositionen anderer Meister heraus, denen die Schilderung des Waldwebens und des Waldzaubers weit besser gelungen ist. Ich erinnere nur an die herrliche Waldsymphonie von Raff, an die Mendelsohn'sche Musik zum Sommernachtstraum und an Wagner's Waldidylle im Siegfried. Die Mac Dowell'sche Musik, so ansprechend, melodiös und originell sie auch ist, bleibt so gut wie Alles schuldig, um vor die lauschende Seele des Hörers den tiefen Wald mit seinem geheimnißvollen Weben erstehen zu lassen. Warum also diese Bezeichnungen, die den Eindruck machen, als wären sie nach Vollendung der Suite erst im Studirzimmer hinzugefügt worden.

Und dann auch taucht die Frage auf, warum dieser hochbegabte Komponist nicht stärker seine Nationalität in seinen Werken betont hat? Da hätte er wahrhaft Originales schaffen können, denn für das feine Ohr eines Musikers und das tiefe Empfinden eines Poeten giebt es hier zu Lande einen reichen Schatz zu heben, zu dem noch nicht einmal der erste Schacht gegraben worden ist. Sollte einem amerikanischen Komponisten nicht die Schilderung der amerikanischen Natur, des amerikanischen Lebens in Flur und Wald, auf den Steppen Arizona's, in den rauhen Bergen des Felsengebirges, in den früchte- und blumenreichen Triften Californien's und dem Plantagenleben der Südstaaten näher liegen, als eine zahme, nachempfundene Schilderung eines deutschen Sommeridylls, den Gesang einer idealisirten Schäferin, oder die kraftlose Zeichnung eines verzauberten Waldes?

Befreit man aber das Werk von seinen irreführenden „Wegweisern" und betrachtet es lediglich als die Schöpfung eines Musikers, der bestimmte Stimmungen in Töne auszudrücken bestrebt war, so wird man ihm die vollste Anerkennung nicht versagen können. Es ist reich in der Erfindung, klar in der Zeichnung und voll zarter Melodien. Es ist ein Werk, das mehr erfreut, als erhebt, mehr ein Wohlgefallen auslöst als Bewunderung hervorruft, eine Arbeit, in die man sich nicht zu versenken [illegible] deren einfache Schön-

Despite [illegible] vorzüglich, mit Herausarbeitung der verborgendsten Effekte, wie denn überhaupt das Orchester den höchsten Ansprüchen gerecht wurde. Mit zündendem Feuer wurde die Bizet'sche Dramatische Ouverture „Patrie" gespielt und mit großartigem Schwunge die effektvolle Frühlings-Ouvertüre von Goldmark.

Der Soloist des Abends war Herr Fritz Kreisler, über dessen wundervolles Spiel sich wirklich nichts Neues mehr sagen läßt. Wieder war sein Ton von satter Färbung und sein Vortrag von männlicher Schönheit. Nichts Weichliches, Krankhaftes, Verblassendes, sondern immer spürt man das gesunde, kraftvolle Empfinden einer genialen Künstlerseele, die aus einem unergründlichen Vorrath reichster Schätze, reines Gold und funkelnde Steine emporreicht. Herr Kreisler spielte das Brahms'sche Violin-Konzert, eine Komposition, die auch technisch dem Künstler manche schwierige Aufgabe zu lösen aufgab. Aber für die souveräne Bogenführung dieses Meisters giebt es keine Schwierigkeit, er scheint über alle Launen und Neckereien des Komponisten zu lächeln, eilt über alle bizarren Notengebilde mit sicherem Schritte hinweg und hat nur das Eine beständig vor Augen, das Geheimniß der Musik, ihre Seele zu ergründen und in Tönen wieder zu geben. Und da ihm das gelang, so wurde ihm, was ihm gebührte, ein Beifallsschauer aus gerührten und erhobenen Herzen.

P. G.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...

...

...

DR MUCK AND AMERICAN COMPOSERS.

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way, by placing many of their works on his programmes in Bosto nand elsewhere. Last year there appeared works by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Payne, and Strube. This year he has already played works by Chadwick, Loeffleur and MacDowell, and in the near future more will be played. So far there have appeared on his programmes in Boston, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite," and second pianoforte concerto, and Schelling's "Suite Fantastique."

In the near future he is to play Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," MacDowll's "Indian Suite," which, by the way, he had on his programmes a year ago; a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley; two new pieces for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music. Certainly American composers have nothing to complain of in their treatment by the Boston Symphony Orches a.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY

FEBRUARY 29, 1908

An Anglo-American Programme for the Next Symphony Concerts—The Debut of the Czerwonky Quartet—Quality Rather Than Quantity in the Calendar for March

Dr. Muck has "unified" his programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week in rather unusual fashion. He has made in his time here all-Russian, all-Czech, all-romantic and all-eighteenth-century programmes, and now he has contrived an Anglo-American list. The English item in it is Arthur Hinton's concerto for piano and orchestra, in which his wife, Katherine Goodson, will play the solo part. Mr. Hinton is one of the younger and "emancipated" English composers who have cut themselves free from the academic traditions and pedantic shams of British music, fostered their own individuality, and gained strength and courage from the ultra-modern examples of France and Germany. His concerto, first played in America at the Worcester Festival last October, is frankly a piece for a virtuoso, but it has, as well, the rhapsodic quality that is the vitality of true virtuoso music. And in Miss Goodson, as she has often proved in her recitals here, is a like warmth. The American pieces are MacDowell's "Indian Suite," the most mature, substantial and vivid of his orchestral writing, and the "Dramatic Scenes" that Mr. Converse arranged for the concert-room from the overture, the entr'actes and the incidental music that he wrote for Mr. MacKaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc," when Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern acted it last year. In the theatre a babble of tongues and feet drowned the music, and Mr. Goodrich's orchestra played it here in concert last winter under some disadvantages. Now it will come to performance under very favorable conditions and after thorough revision by the composer himself.

P[illegible] MARCH 1, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Warnke, 'Cellist, Plays New Work by Dohnanyi

At the sixteenth public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Hermann Bischoff's symphony, which was given for the first time in this city three weeks ago, was repeated. Schumann's "Manfred" overture opened the programme, and between the two, Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, played, for the first time here, a "Concert piece in D major, for orchestra, with violoncello obligato," by Ernst von Dohnanyi. In many respects Schumann could not have found a subject more in consonance with his introspective and brooding temperament than the hero of Byron's overwrought drama. It is not difficult to understand the fascination that the tale must have exerted upon the imaginative and romantic German. Probably the latter never created music more dramatic, and, what does not necessarily follow, suitable for the theatre, than this overture, which surely ranks among his greatest orchestral achievements. Schumann was never more truly successful in writing strains to clothe poetry than in his incidental music to "Manfred," not even in the most remarkable of the settings of scenes from Goethe's "Faust."

This music tells in every measure. Recall the sharp opening chords of the overture, the portentous trumpet motive, and what is so endearingly Schumannish, the beautiful Astarte theme as it tosses and struggles in the strings. And the orchestration is often remarkably vivid and graphic. There are many places where the composer, for a very unusual thing, appears to have thought in the characteristic idiom of his instruments.

Yet, in spite of it all, one remembers that Schumann was but half a strong man. He rarely became fearsome in his wrath. Compare this very subjective music with Tchaikowsky's overwhelming work inspired by the same theme, and small it seems, remembered by the side of that terrible woe. It is also significant that Nietzche, the philosopher, who possessed far greater creative abilities as a musician than he was credited with by contemporaries, wrote a "Meditation on Manfred," with which the writer has been privileged to make slight acquaintance; and in this piece, where the philosopher-composer has involuntarily been influenced by our very Robert Schumann, he has, nevertheless, in our estimation, shown a greater capacity for portraying the tortured soul that Byron conceived than the illustrious romanticist that he—Nietzche—plagiarized. The performance of the overture was highly dramatic.

The concert piece by Dohnanyi is a recent composition by that composer, and it was played for the first time by Mr. Warnke at a concert given by the orchestra in Indianapolis a few days ago. It is hard to find justification for the title of the piece, for it is not by any means an orchestral composition, with an obligato part for 'cello. It is very obviously a 'cello solo with an orchestral accompaniment, that is usually tasteful and properly subdued in color.

A number of Dohnanyi's compositions have been given here of late years, and in some cases it has been difficult to credit the same man with having written them all, for as a composer Dohnanyi has shown two different faces. He is now boresomely pedantic, but again imaginative to a surprising and far-reaching degree.

The concert piece given yesterday takes you by the hand through pleasingly fanciful vistas, but it is unfortunately flimsy in its length and proportions. Scored for small orchestra, the accompaniment is usually very pleasing, save where, possibly to redeem the promise of the title, the orchestra momentarily overpowers the solo instrument. A striking feature of the piece is the persistent, often reiterated rhythmic beats of the kettledrum on a certain note. The figure occurs significantly as a bridge between the divisions of the work, which is in one movement, and the same note becomes the foundation of a long "pedal-point" that brings the piece to its conclusion. The composition, notwithstanding its undue length and occasional inadequacy of structure, will probably become popular with 'cellists in the future. It is in many pages contagiously charming. Mr. Warnke played eloquently with a broad and warm tone. He was cordially received.

Then — the interminable symphony. But it was right that this monstrosity should be heard again, and at the second hearing, doubtless partly owing to a surpassing performance, many interesting details showed out. The first three movements rang truer than on the previous occasion. If this composer would but refrain from his eternal quibbling, from everlasting chewing over of every single phrase or figure that his torturesome brain evolves. It is impossible to deny that there is some meat and much sincerity in the symphony; it is equally impossible to accept it as a thing of any great or permanent value. Bischoff as yet has not found his own voice; his instrumentation, swollen and artificial to an exasperating degree, is no more his own. Your clothes are loud, sir! They are beyond your means, and they do not belong to you!

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, will offer, for the first time at the Symphony concerts, Mr. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra," after Percy Mackay's drama, and Mr. Arthur Hinton's pianoforte concerto, which was played by Miss Goodson for the first time in this country at the Worcester Festival last fall. Mr. Converse's music consists of instrumental excerpts taken from his incidental music to the play, and this music was given at the performance by Sothern and Marlowe in 1906. It was in the same year that the suite arranged for orchestra was performed for the first time, under Mr. Wallace Goodrich's direction, at a Jordan Hall concert. Since then these movements have been extensively revised by the composer. The final item of the programme will be MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which was played by the orchestra last season.

[155]

HERALD — BOSTON, MARCH

16TH CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bischoff's Composition Given Repetition by Dr. Muck's Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to Byron's "Manfred".....Schumann
Concert piece for orchestra with 'cello obbligato.....Dohnanyi
(First time here.)
Symphony in E major.....Bischoff

Bischoff's symphony, which was played here for the first time early in January, was performed again last night. It was only meet and fitting that a symphony of so great dimensions and important contents should be heard again, and especially under the conductor who brought out the work with the most patient rehearsal and the keenest objective interest.

Unfortunately the symphony suffered last evening by coming after a long drawn out concert piece by Dohnanyi. The performance of this piece might well have been deferred. The concert would have been long enough without any middle piece between the overture and the symphony, and the mood of the "Manfred" overture is an excellent preparation for that of the first symphonic movement of Bischoff. The sweetness of Dohnanyi's music, too often cloying and stretched out as molasses candy may be pulled, was here incongruous. The symphony is defiantly long, but it is well worth hearing as a whole. To enjoy it, or to appreciate with only moderate rapture, the hearer should have heard little music and that should have been familiar.

Dohnanyi's music, by the way, is in the form of a concert piece with 'cello obbligato. The solo 'cello part was played by Mr. Warnke of the orchestra, and he displayed a fine tone and many niceties in phrasing. The music is out of the common. It is monotonously sweet in sentiment; the composer, enamoured of this or that thought, either for the 'cello or as an orchestral figure in accompaniment or in the background, is loath to let anything go. But there are interesting things in this concert piece.

There are novel and charming orchestral effects; there are one or two exquisite tone pictures in miniature; there are instances of the rhythmic monotony that is oriental and hypnotic; there is, above all, a brave departure from the conventional form of the 'cello concerto with its cantilena for the mistress' eyebrow and the irritating acrobatic feats, from the pursuit of unseen flies to the imitation of the pump-handle. The bravura passages are apparently not extraneous and aggressively ornamental. They come directly from the melodic thought and are as extensions of it. Soothing music, this, but too long spun out.

Now the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the symphony would have gone well together. Schumann's overture is probably better known to concertgoers than the tragedy that inspired it. How many in the hall could have passed a rigid examination, could have answered satisfactorily a paper of "Manfred" questions? What were Astarte's feelings toward Manfred? Explain the difference between the various spirits invoked. What did the chamois hunter think of Manfred? Whither did the latter go when he died? Was the abbot sure of Manfred's destination?

Perhaps Manfred was Byron himself, as Hazlitt insisted, with a drapery over him, but it is a pity that the poem is not studied in the schools, for at the time when it appeared and for some years afterward it had a great influence in Europe. Goethe, no honey dauber, thought highly of it. But it became the fashion to sneer at Byron, his misanthropy and his tragic lines. Some poohpoohed him as though he were a Fitzball or Moncrieff of oriental melo-drama with: "Now let the Almahs, with their feat steps beguile awhile my soul from moody care." But they accepted the orientalism of Disraeli and later that of Mr. Kipling.

Surely any drama that moved Schumann and Tschaikowsky to musical sympathy and to intense expression deserves even in this commercial age respectful consideration, and after a course in "Manfred," "The Corsair" and the other plays with scowling heroes, there should be a course in "Beppo" and "Don Juan." The latter is much healthier reading for the young than much of that which now serves them as literary fodder.

According to Bischoff's argument prepared for the first performance, this symphony is written in Byronic spirit. A second hearing enlarged the respect felt for the composer after the first performance. The first movement throbs with the blood of extravagant youth. There is the riotous expression of delight in the cheap joys of life. The expression is perhaps at times frankly Asiatic, to use a term dear to the old rhetoricians. There is excess here as in other movements, but this excess is not a revelation of weakness; on the contrary, it is the excess that Samuel Palmer described as "the vivifying spirit of finest art."

The second movement was more impressive throughout than at the first performance. There are passages in it that recall certain moods of "Parsifal," but they are only faint echoes of determined voices. Bischoff follows neither Strauss nor Wagner blindly. As an intimate friend of the former he has contracted certain mannerisms of speech and gesture, the way of cocking his hat—his thoughts are his own, his speech is his own, and there are times when he goes beyond his master in imaginative flights. This second movement has noble and memorable pages. The third movement is remarkable in many ways. The finale still seems the least striking of the movements.

Although there were a few false attacks in the performance of the symphony, the interpretation as a whole was a superb one, full of the rush and roar of life and the splendor of the animal man exulting or downcast. The performance of the overture was stirring and the finale was singularly beautiful as read by Dr. Muck.

GLOBE—MARCH

Repetition of Bischoff's Colossal Symphony.

Seat Sale for the Grand Opera Season at the Boston.

Sousa Tonight — Other Concerts of the Week.

The 16th Symphony program began with Schumann's overture to "Manfred," then followed for the first time here Dohnanyi's concert piece for 'cello and orchestra, Mr Heinrich Warnke soloist, closing with a repetition of the colossal E major symphony by Bischoff, which made so profound an impression when played here early in January of this year. This is said to be the most difficult new work attempted by the orchestra under Dr Muck, and a second hearing justifies the statement.

The symphony is rightly termed colossal, for the difficulties sprinkled through the score of each contingent are so numerous that many rehearsals were required before the present state of their standard in ensemble work was reached by the orchestra men. An hour of such music as this taxes not only the endurance of players and the conductor, but the auditor, if appreciative, feels there has been a test for him to stand which could not be called trivial.

The musical illustration of the adventures of a Don Juan was shown in all the vividness of tonal coloring that marked the earlier performances. An impressive interpretation of a big composition by a body of skilled players epitomizes the facts in this case. That Bischoff's work was better played than before may be true; at all events some of the heavier instrumentation sounded more euphonious and possibly on the second hearing the composition, like others of solid worth, "grew upon" the hearer. The audience evidently enjoyed the performance, for the applause was spontaneous and hearty.

The first 'cellist of the orchestra, Mr Warnke, gave a fine performance of his part in the Dohnanyi concert piece. The 'cello score runs so largely to sustained passages of melody, the legato figures predominating, that the beautiful cantabel quality of Mr Warnke's work made the piece specially interesting. Had there been lapses from the pitch in fingering or rough bowing the general suavity of the composition would have been cloying.

But there was nothing of the kind, and the refinement, expressive changes in phrasing and perfect tone production again gave evidences of the splendid abilities of the first 'cellist of the orchestra. The support of his fellow-players was all that could be desired and the approbation of the audience for Mr Warnke's performance was generously expressed. The Schumann overture was given with fine effect.

In this week's program two of the three composers are American, and the third is English. For the first time the orchestra will play Mr Converse's dramatic scenes for orchestra, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc." This was incidentally music written for the performances of a play which was presented last year by Mr Sothern and Miss Marlowe. At one of his concerts last season Mr Goodrich played these scenes, but since then the composer has extensively revised them.

The Englishman is Mr Hinton, the husband of Katharine Goodson, who will be the soloist and who will play for the first time in Boston Mr Hinton's concerto for piano. The other number will be Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

JOURNAL-MARCH 2, 1908

ORCHESTRA GIVES A RARE CONCERT

'Cellist Warnke, the Soloist, and Dr. Muck Conducts With Superb Effect.

Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday night. He chose to introduce to Boston Dohnanyi's new concert piece in D major, with 'cello obbligato. The work had its first performance in this country in Indianapolis on Jan. 28, when the orchestra was on its Western tour. It is not altogether impressive or even interesting, but it gave Mr. Warnke an opportunity to display his beautiful tone and equally beautiful artistry. Mr. Warnke is a thoroughbred artist, skilled in technique, and, what is far more to the point in these days of mechanical players, absolutely responsive to the spirit of the piece he plays. Feeling and intelligence combined with dexterity make him one of the most distinguished 'cellists of the day. So he proved himself to be on this occasion.

The orchestra itself was in rare fettle and gave a memorable performance of Bischoff's powerful symphony in E major, the much-discussed work that had its initial American performance at the first Symphony concert of the year. It is an epoch-marking work as regards both its artistic and its dramatic qualities. It is the highest praise to say that the orchestra, under the stimulating leadership of Dr. Muck, apparently did full justice to it. Equally effective was the performance of Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," with which the concert began.

The soloist next Saturday night will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who will play here for the first time the Hinton concerto for piano. The program also offers the Converse "Jeanne d'Arc" music and

TRANSCRIPT—MONDAY, MARCH

A NEW SORT OF PIECE FOR THE VIOLONCELLO

Mr. Dohnanyi's "Concert Piece" as Mr. Warnke and the Orchestra Played It at the Symphony Concerts—Bischoff's Symphony Again—A Play About New England by New Englanders Acted in London—Henry Thompson Once More—Josef Hofmann Plays a Concerto of His Own—Langdon Mitchell's New Comedy—Other News

Mr. Dohnanyi, who has gradually become more composer than pianist, is an ingenious and imaginative writer for stringed instruments. His "Serenade" that the Hoffmann Quartet played here early in the season, was a well-made and pleasantly fanciful piece with agreeable feeling for the timbres of the three instruments that he used. His sonata for piano and 'cello, played later at one of Mr. Fox's concerts, had more workmanship than imagination, but in one respect it was notable. Mr. Dohnanyi would have none of the 'cello as a capering instrument, pretending to trip through passages of bravura and keep its warmth and dignity of tone. The composer seemed to respect the instrument and to heed the modern view of it too much to abase it so. In the same spirit, seemingly, he wrote the "Concert-Piece for Orchestra with 'Cello Obligato" which Mr. Warnke and the Symphony Orchestra played at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. It is long, as such pieces go, but throughout Mr. Dohanyi steadily keeps the 'cello a songful instrument. He gives the virtuoso his cadenza—a composer could not do less—and a cadenza that contains some very difficult harmonics, but he does not set the instrument to lumbering runs and laborious prancing. By so much, the "Concert-Piece" was good to hear. The taste for the 'cello, toddling heavy-footed through bravura passages, has happily vanished, and it belonged to the days when purling concertos for the flute or gurgling pieces for horn had their place on serious programmes. To the modern audience, be it at orchestral or chamber concerts, the 'cello is primarily an instrument of deep, rich, warm and sustained song, and if it is to keep its precarious place as a solo instrument, the composers who write for it and the virtuosi who play what they have written, must hold to that quality. Recall, for example, the tedium of Dvorak's concerto, which neglects it.

Even so, the song of the 'cello, however felicitously invented, modulated and brought to voice, tends to become monotonous in a piece thirty minutes long, and the ear craves a lightness, brightness, and diversity that it may not give. Mr. Dohnanyi avoids this pitfall ingeniously and interestingly. Often his "Concert-Piece" is an adroit and persuasive exercise in the combination and the contrast of the tone of the 'cello with other orchestral timbres. Sometimes, as in his cadenza, he treats the 'cello as a solo instrument in more or less of the fashion of conventional pieces for it, but oftener it is genuinely "obbligato" as it weaves the dominant strand in the whole instrumental tapestry. Moreover, since Mr. Dohnanyi keeps to the songful quality of the 'cello, these fusing or contrasting tonal colors are almost always subdued. The slow section of the "Concert Piece" seems, for example, at a first hearing, too long drawn and too little varied song. At a second the ear and the fancy answer to the delicate shadings of the tonal tints; the pensive, gently rapt mood of the music communicates itself; and for once a piece for 'cello and orchestra has a touch—and more—of poetry in it. Mr. Dohnanyi was writing with imagination, and the 'cello was the becoming voice of his fancies. Neither at the beginning nor at the end does he speak more vigorously, but he writes with the same subdued air, the same delicate feeling for shaded instrumental timbres in and against the voice of the 'cello. Again, the "Concert Piece" was good to hear, because it had found a new way in which to make the 'cello interesting. Moreover, music of such spirit asked the characteristic qualities of Mr. Warnke as a virtuoso. His tone has less largeness and depth than a soft, suave, fluent and adroitly refined quality. It has almost exactly the subdued and sensitive beauty, the sustained but delicately varied songful quality that gives sympathetic and pleasureable utterance to Mr. Dohnanyi's piece. The 'cellist's mastery of the technic of his instrument was elegant ease itself; his undulating tone kept the subdued life of the music, and his shadings of that tone were as interesting in themselves as it was in contrast or combination with the other instrumental voices. Mr. Warnke indeed played with no less imagination in these things than Mr. Dohnanyi wrote. The obbligato—in spite of the modest title—dominated the song, and even the cadenza was subdued to its mood.

Again, Bischoff's symphony, in all its huge and intricate orchestral fabric and in all its huge and vivid imaginings, came to mighty performance. As a tour de force of hot-breathed and sonorous-voiced orchestral eloquence, Dr. Muck and the band have done nothing within memory to match it, unless it was their performance of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," last year. There, moreover, even Strauss set himself bounds and kept within them. Bischoff, fairly reeling with the monstrous imaginative scheme that has obsessed him, would scale the heights of heaven and, oftener, plumb the depths of hell. Sometimes he attains neither, but halts in a kind of ecstatic limbo of orchestral sound, fury, outcry and even confusion. But when he does attain one of his goals, he can write such music as that of the scherzo with its gibbering voices of old sins and its snaky phantoms of old revels—music of a harrowing grotesquerie of imagination and expression such as no one seemingly has written since Berlioz's time. There is need to return to it, as well, to match the sheer luridness, emotional and musical, that fills the debauch, in more senses than one, of the first movement. In these two parts of the symphony it is easy to believe in Bischoff as a composer of strange and monstrous imagination, a belated Poe with music for his medium, already masterful in it, already bending it to imaginings and a temperament that are like no other of his time. He would scale heaven, as in his finale, with like huge strike, and like superhuman intensity, but as yet he hardly makes his music march and cry with him. H. T. P.

Besides Mr. Hinton's concerto for piano and orchestra, which Miss Goodson is to play at the next pair of Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck has still more music new to Boston in preparation—in particular Balakireff's symphony in C major which has gone the round of many concerts without much success; a suite by Halvorsen, the Scandinavian composer; and two pieces for orchestra with viola obbligata by Mr. Strube of the orchestra and with Mr. Férir to play the viola part.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 2 - 1908

In the fifteen symphony programmes that have been played in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year Dr. Muck has presented a total number of eighteen works which are new to Boston, and a majority of them have had their first hearing in America. In the next four programmes are seven more novelties, and these twenty-five works have not exhausted the list prepared for the season, for in the last concerts one or two important novelties will be played. The works new to Boston which Dr. Muck has placed on his programmes this year so far are Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Elf," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," Rdznicek's adagio and scherzo, finale from his suite in E minor; Ernst Boehe's symponic poem "Taormina," Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage;" D'Ambrosio's concerto for violin in B minor, Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and strings, Franck's symphonic piece "The Redemption;" Bischoff's symphon- in E major, three German dances by Mozart, Schelling's fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme of J. A. Hiller; Scheiderup's "Summer Night on a Fjord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," and Rinsky-Korsokoff's caprice on Spanish themes. In the next four concerts he will present Dohanyi's concert piece for orchestra with cello obligato, Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, Hinton's concerto for piano, Balakireff's symphony in C major, Halvorsen's "Fossegrimen," suite for orchestra, and two pieces for orchestra, with viola obligato by Gustav Strube. The Bischoff symphony and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" are both repeated.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908.

SYMPHONY BATON IS TO GO TO MAX FIEDLER

Famous Hamburg Director to Succeed Dr. Muck as Conductor. Recommended by the Doctor. Is Favorably Known in America.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been named to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. This announcement was made by the management of the orchestra yesterday and has been received with general satisfaction. Mr. Fiedler was recommended to the Boston men by Dr. Muck himself, and as soon as it was positively learned that the leave of absence of the present conductor—granted by Emperor William—could not be further extended, negotiations were commenced. Mr. Fiedler is looked upon as one of the leading conductors of Germany and was a student with Dr. Muck at Leipzig Conservatory.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg Conservatory, and since 1905 he has been its director. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra concerts and one of the principal conductors of the Hamburg Opera. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York. In the last-named city he conducted the Philharmonic Society, and of the various conductors brought to America by this society none seems to have made a more favorable impression on the musical public of New York.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
MAR 5- 1908

Max Fiedler, Dirigent der Bostoner.

Boston, Mass., 4. März. Wie heute Abend von der Geschäftsleitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters bekannt gemacht wurde, ist Max Fiedler aus Hamburg als Dirigent des Orchesters an Stelle des Dr. Karl Muck gewonnen worden, welcher in Berlin keinen weiteren Urlaub hat erlangen können. Herr Fiedler wird seine Stellung bei Beginn der nächsten Saison antreten.

[156]

From
Address N. Y.
Date FEB 29 1908

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place on Friday evening of last week, and again, as on each of the three previous occasions, the Baptist Temple was crowded. The program was an exceedingly charming one, calculated to please lovers of pure melody as well as those who are educated up to an intellectual appreciation of harmony for its own sake. To be sure those of the audience who did not come fully into the latter category were a bit disappointed at finding in their programs a special announcement stating that Mr. Fritz Kreisler had decided to play Brahms's violin concerto instead of Lalo's Spanish Symphony previously announced. The substitution undoubtedly served better to demonstrate the violinist's mastery of his instrument than the other would have done, but it put a considerable strain upon some of the audience, especially in the first movement, in which the orchestra seemed to have a bit the better of the violin, and while the difficult task was performed with marvelous technical accuracy it cannot be said that it was accomplished without the appearance of effort on the part of the musician. Mr. Kreisler at the conclusion of the concerto was tremendously applauded and forced to come before the audience again and again, but all efforts to induce him to play something else were unavailing. The program opened with MacDowell's suite in A minor; a sylvan suite in which each of the five parts is as remarkable for mystical idealistic feeling as it is for brevity. Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie," was the second orchestral number and though, perhaps, the least sophisticated number on the program was the best calculated to stir the soul of the musical Philistine. As played by the Boston Orchestra, under the inimitable leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, it was what the same Philistine would pronounce "simply ripping." The last number, Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," was also very delightful. Aside from his consummate abilities as a leader, it must be confessed that the engaging personality of Dr. Karl Muck, as refreshingly free from any suggestion of affectation as it is from aloofness, has lent a new and material attractiveness to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

* * *

RECORD, THURSDAY,
MARCH 5, 1908

MAX FIEDLER TO LEAD SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Noted German Conductor Secured to Succeed Dr. Muck for Next Season—Was Latter's Choice.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, according to an official announcement made yesterday.

He is a close friend of Dr. Muck, whom he succeeds, and was secured at the latter's suggestion. They were students together at the Leipsig conservatory.

As soon as it was certain that Dr. Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin, negotiations were begun with Fielder, who ranks among the leading conductors of Germany.

Max Fiedler was born in Zittau Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany, and he ranks high as a composer.

His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a pupil at the Leipsig conservatory on the Hofstein foundation.

Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg conservatory, and since 1905 he has been its director. During these years he did considerable work as a pianist, but most of his time has been given to teaching and conducting.

Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg orchestra concerts, and one of the principal conductors of the Hamburg opera.

As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York. In the last-named city he conducted the Philharmonic Society of Dec. 15 and 16, 1905, and of the various conductors brought to America by this society none seems to have made a more favorable impression on the musical public of New York.

His compositions include a symphony in D minor which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintette for piano and strings, a string quartette, songs, piano pieces, etc.

TIMES,
New York City.
MAR 5 1908

FIEDLER TO SUCCEED MUCK

Hamburg Conductor Will Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 4.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that August Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Carl Muck, who has been unable to get a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of next season.

This orchestra director, who is also a pianist and composer, was born in Zittau in 1859. He studied the piano with his father and theory and organ playing with G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil in the Leipsic Conservatory. In 1882 he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory, and often appeared publicly as a piano player. He has composed a piano quintet, a string quartet, a symphony in D minor, and several songs and piano pieces.

GLOBE—MARCH 1, 1908

Repetition of Bischoff's Colossal Symphony.

Seat Sale for the Grand Opera Season at the Boston.

Sousa Tonight — Other Concerts of the Week.

The 16th Symphony program began with Schumann's overture to "Manfred," then followed for the first time here Dohnanyi's concert piece for 'cello and orchestra, Mr Heinrich Warnke soloist, closing with a repetition of the colossal E major symphony by Bischoff. which made so profound an impression when played here early in January of this year. This is said to be the most difficult new work attempted by the orchestra under Dr Muck, and a second hearing justifies the statement.

The symphony is rightly termed colossal, for the difficulties sprinkled through the score of each contingent are so numerous that many rehearsals were required before the present state of their standard in ensemble work was reached by the orchestra men. An hour of such music as this taxes not only the endurance of players and the conductor, but the auditor, if appreciative, feels there has been a test for him to stand which could not be called trivial.

The musical illustration of the adventures of a Don Juan was shown in all the vividness of tonal coloring that marked the earlier performances. An impressive interpretation of a big composition by a body of skilled players epitomizes the facts in this case. That Bischoff's work was better played than before may be true; at all events some of the heavier instrumentation sounded more euphonious and possibly on the second hearing the composition, like others of solid worth, "grew upon" the hearer. The audience evidently enjoyed the performance, for the applause was spontaneous and hearty.

The first 'cellist of the orchestra, Mr Warnke, gave a fine performance of his part in the Dohnanyi concert piece. The 'cello score runs so largely to sustained passages of melody, the legato figures predominating, that the beautiful cantabel quality of Mr Warnke's work made the piece specially interesting. Had there been lapses from the pitch in fingering or rough bowing the general suavity of the composition would have been cloying.

But there was nothing of the kind, and the refinement, expressive changes in phrasing and perfect tone production again gave evidences of the splendid abilities of the first 'cellist of the orchestra. The support of his fellow-players was all that could be desired and the approbation of the audience for Mr Warnke's performance was generously expressed. The Schumann overture was given with fine effect.

In this week's program two of the three composers are American, and the third is English. For the first time the orchestra will play Mr Converse's dramatic scenes for orchestra, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc." This was incidentally music written for the performances of a play which was presented last year by Mr Sothern and Miss Marlowe. At one of his concerts last season Mr Goodrich played these scenes, but since then the composer has extensively revised them.

The Englishman is Mr Hinton, the husband of Katharine Goodson, who will be the soloist and who will play for the first time in Boston Mr Hinton's concerto for piano. The other number will be Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

JOURNAL-MARCH 2, 1908

ORCHESTRA GIVES A RARE CONCERT

'Cellist Warnke, the Soloist, and Dr. Muck Conducts With Superb Effect.

Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday night. He chose to introduce to Boston Dohnanyi's new concert piece in D major, with 'cello obbligato. The work had its first performance in this country in Indianapolis on Jan. 28, when the orchestra was on its Western tour. It is not altogether impressive or even interesting, but it gave Mr. Warnke an opportunity to display his beautiful tone and equally beautiful artistry. Mr. Warnke is a thoroughbred artist, skilled in technique, and, what is far more to the point in these days of mechanical players, absolutely responsive to the spirit of the piece he plays. Feeling and intelligence combined with dexterity make him one of the most distinguished 'cellists of the day. So he proved himself to be on this occasion.

The orchestra itself was in rare fettle and gave a memorable performance of Bischoff's powerful symphony in E major, the much-discussed work that had its initial American performance at the first Symphony concert of the year. It is an epoch-marking work as regards both its artistic and its dramatic qualities. It is the highest praise to say that the orchestra, under the stimulating leadership of Dr. Muck, apparently did full justice to it. Equally effective was the performance of Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," with which the concert began.

The soloist next Saturday night will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who will play here for the first time the Hinton concerto for piano. The program also offers the Converse "Jeanne d'Arc" music and MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MARCH 2, 1908

A NEW SORT OF PIECE FOR THE VIOLONCELLO

Mr. Dohnanyi's "Concert Piece" as Mr. Warnke and the Orchestra Played It at the Symphony Concerts—Bischoff's Symphony Again—A Play About New England by New Englanders Acted in London—Henry Thompson Once More—Josef Hofmann Plays a Concerto of His Own—Langdon Mitchell's New Comedy—Other News

Mr. Dohnanyi, who has gradually become more composer than pianist ,is an ingenious and imaginative writer for stringed instruments. His "Serenade" that the Hoffmann Quartet played here early in the season, was a well-made and pleasantly fanciful piece with agreeable feeling for the timbres of the three instruments that he used. His sonata for piano and 'cello, played later at one of Mr. Fox's concerts, had more workmanship than imagination, but in one respect it was notable. Mr. Dohnanyi would have none of the 'cello as a capering instrument, pretending to trip through passages of bravura and keep its warmth and dignity of tone. The composer seemed to respect the instrument and to heed the modern view of it too much to abase it so. In the same spirit, seemingly, he wrote the "Concert-Piece for Orchestra with 'Cello Obligato" which Mr. Warnke and the Symphony Orchestra played at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. It is long, as such pieces go, but throughout Mr. Dohanyi steadily keeps the 'cello a songful instrument. He gives the virtuoso his cadenza—a composer could not do less—and a cadenza that contains some very difficult harmonics, but he does not set the instrument to lumbering runs and laborious prancing. By so much, the "Concert-Piece" was good to hear. The taste for the 'cello, toddling heavy-footed through bravura passages, has happily vanished, and it belonged to the days when purling concertos for the flute or gurgling pieces for horn had their place on serious programmes. To the modern audience, be it at orchestral or chamber concerts, the 'cello is primarily an instrument of deep, rich, warm and sustained song, and if it is to keep its precarious place as a solo instrument, the composers who write for it and the virtuosi who play what they have written, must hold to that quality. Recall, for example, the tedium of Dvorak's concerto, which neglects it.

Even so, the song of the 'cello, however felicitously invented, modulated and brought to voice, tends to become monotonous in a piece thirty minutes long, and the ear craves a lightness, brightness, and diversity that it may not give. Mr. Dohnanyi avoids this pitfall ingeniously and interestingly. Often his "Concert-Piece" is an adroit and persuasive exercise in the combination and the contrast of the tone of the 'cello with other orchestral timbres. Sometimes, as in his cadenza, he treats the 'cello as a solo instrument in more or less of the fashion of conventional pieces for it, but oftener it is genuinely "obbligato" as it weaves the dominant strand in the whole instrumental tapestry. Moreover, since Mr. Dohnanyi keeps to the songful quality of the 'cello, these fusing or contrasting tonal colors are almost always subdued. The slow section of the "Concert Piece" seems, for example, at a first hearing, too long drawn and too little varied song. At a second the ear and the fancy answer to the delicate shadings of the tonal tints; the pensive, gently rapt mood of the music communicates itself; and for once a piece for 'cello and orchestra has a touch—and more—of poetry in it. Mr. Dohnanyi was writing with imagination, and the 'cello was the becoming voice of his fancies. Neither at the beginning nor at the end does he speak more vigorously, but he writes with the same subdued air, the same delicate feeling for shaded instrumental timbres in and against the voice of the 'cello. Again, the "Concert Piece" was good to hear, because it had found a new way in which to make the 'cello interesting. Moreover, music of such spirit asked the characteristic qualities of Mr. Warnke as a virtuoso. His tone has less largeness and depth than a soft, suave, fluent and adroitly refined quality. It has almost exactly the subdued and sensitive beauty, the sustained but delicately varied songful quality that gives sympathetic and pleasureable utterance to Mr. Dohnanyi's piece. The 'cellist's mastery of the technic of his instrument was elegant ease itself; his undulating tone kept the subdued life of the music, and his shadings of that tone were as interesting in themselves as it was in contrast or combination with the other instrumental voices. Mr. Warnke indeed played with no less imagination in these things than Mr. Dohnanyi wrote. The obbligato—in spite of the modest title—dominated the song, and even the cadenza was subdued to its mood.

Again, Bischoff's symphony, in all its huge and intricate orchestral fabric and in all its huge and vivid imaginings, came to mighty performance. As a tour de force of hot-breathed and sonorous-voiced orchestral eloquence, Dr. Muck and the band have done nothing within memory to match it, unless it was their performance of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," last year. There, moreover, even Strauss set himself bounds and kept within them. Bischoff, fairly reeling with the monstrous imaginative scheme that has obsessed him, would scale the heights of heaven and, oftener, plumb the depths of hell. Sometimes he attains neither, but halts in a kind of ecstatic limbo of orchestral sound, fury, outcry and even confusion. But when he does attain one of his goals, he can write such music as that of the scherzo with its gibbering voices of old sins and its snaky phantoms of old revels—music of a harrowing grotesquerie of imagination and expression such as no one seemingly has written since Berlioz's time. There is need to return to it, as well, to match the sheer luridness, emotional and musical, that fills the debauch, in more senses than one, of the first movement. In these two parts of the symphony it is easy to believe in Bischoff as a composer of strange and monstrous imagination, a belated Poe with music for his medium, already masterful in it, already bending it to imaginings and a temperament that are like no other of his time. He would scale heaven, as in his finale, with like huge strike, and like superhuman intensity, but as yet he hardly makes his music march and cry with him. H. T. P.

Besides Mr. Hinton's concerto for piano and orchestra, which Miss Goodson is to play at the next pair of Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck has still more music new to Boston in preparation—in particular Balakireff's symphony in C major which has gone the round of many concerts without much success; a suite by Halvorsen, the Scandinavian composer; and two pieces for orchestra with viola obbligata by Mr. Strube of the orchestra and with Mr. Férir to play the viola part.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
1908

In the fifteen symphony programmes that have been played in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year Dr. Muck has presented a total number of eighteen works which are new to Boston, and a majority of them have had their first hearing in America. In the next four programmes are seven more novelties, and these twenty-five works have not exhausted the list prepared for the season, for in the last concerts one or two important novelties will be played. The works new to Boston which Dr. Muck has placed on his programmes this year so far are Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy" Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Elf," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," Rdznicek's adagio and scherzo, finale from his suite in E. minor; Ernst Boehe's symponic poem "Taormina," Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage;" D'Ambrosio's concerto for violin in B minor, Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and strings, Franck's symphonic piece. "The Redemption;" Bischoff's symphony in E major, three German dances by Mozart, Schelling's fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme of J. A. Hiller; Scheiderup's "Summer Night on a Fjord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," and Rinsky-Korsokoff's caprice on Spanish themes. In the next four concerts he will present Dohanyi's concert piece for orchestra with cello obligato, Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, Hinton's concerto for piano, Balakireff's symphony in C major, Halvorsen's "Possegrimen," suite for orchestra, and two pieces for orchestra, with viola obligato by Gustav Strube. The Bischoff symphony and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" are both repeated.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908.

SYMPHONY BATON IS TO GO TO MAX FIEDLER

Famous Hamburg Director to Succeed Dr. Muck as Conductor. Recommended by the Doctor. Is Favorably Known in America.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been named to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. This announcement was made by the management of the orchestra yesterday and has been received with general satisfaction. Mr. Fiedler was recommended to the Boston men by Dr. Muck himself, and as soon as it was positively learned that the leave of absence of the present conductor—granted by Emperor William—could not be further extended, negotiations were commenced. Mr. Fiedler is looked upon as one of the leading conductors of Germany and was a student with Dr. Muck at Leipzig Conservatory.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg Conservatory, and since 1905 he has been its director. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra concerts and one of the principal conductors of the Hamburg Opera. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York. In the last-named city he conducted the Philharmonic Society, and of the various conductors brought to America by this society none seems to have made a more favorable impression on the musical public of New York.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
MAR 5 1908

Max Fiedler, Dirigent der Bostoner.

Boston, Mass., 4. März. Wie heute Abend von der Geschäftsleitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters bekannt gemacht wurde, ist Max Fiedler aus Hamburg als Dirigent des Orchesters an Stelle des Dr. Karl Muck gewonnen worden, welcher in Berlin keinen weiteren Urlaub hat erlangen können. Herr Fiedler wird seine Stellung bei Beginn der nächsten Saison antreten.

[156]

From
Address N. Y.
Date FEB 29 1908

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place on Friday evening of last week, and again, as on each of the three previous occasions, the Baptist Temple was crowded. The program was an exceedingly charming one, calculated to please lovers of pure melody as well as those who are educated up to an intellectual appreciation of harmony for its own sake. To be sure those of the audience who did not come fully into the latter category were a bit disappointed at finding in their programs a special announcement stating that Mr. Fritz Kreisler had decided to play Brahms's violin concerto instead of Lalo's Spanish Symphony previously announced. The substitution undoubtedly served better to demonstrate the violinist's mastery of his instrument than the other would have done, but it put a considerable strain upon some of the audience, especially in the first movement, in which the orchestra seemed to have a bit the better of the violin, and while the difficult task was performed with marvelous technical accuracy it cannot be said that it was accomplished without the appearance of effort on the part of the musician. Mr. Kreisler at the conclusion of the concerto was tremendously applauded and forced to come before the audience again and again, but all efforts to induce him to play something else were unavailing. The program opened with MacDowell's suite in A minor; a sylvan suite in which each of the five parts is as remarkable for mystical idealistic feeling as it is for brevity. Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie," was the second orchestral number and though, perhaps, the least sophisticated number on the program was the best calculated to stir the soul of the musical Philistine. As played by the Boston Orchestra, under the inimitable leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, it was what the same Philistine would pronounce "simply ripping." The last number, Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," was also very delightful. Aside from his consummate abilities as a leader, it must be confessed that the engaging personality of Dr. Karl Muck, as refreshingly free from any suggestion of affectation as it is from aloofness, has lent a new and material attractiveness to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

* * *

RECORD, THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908

MAX FIEDLER TO LEAD SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Noted German Conductor Secured to Succeed Dr. Muck for Next Season—Was Latter's Choice.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, according to an official announcement made yesterday.

He is a close friend of Dr. Muck, whom he succeeds, and was secured at the latter's suggestion. They were students together at the Leipsig conservatory.

As soon as it was certain that Dr. Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin, negotiations were begun with Fielder, who ranks among the leading conductors of Germany.

Max Fiedler was born in Zittau Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany, and he ranks high as a composer.

His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a pupil at the Leipsig conservatory on the Holstein foundation.

Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg conservatory, and since 1905 he has been its director. During these years he did considerable work as a pianist, but most of his time has been given to teaching and conducting.

Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg orchestra concerts, and one of the principal conductors of the Hamburg opera.

As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York. In the last-named city he conducted the Philharmonic Society on Dec. 15 and 16, 1905, and of the various conductors brought to America by this society none seems to have made a more favorable impression on the musical public of New York.

His compositions include a symphony in D minor which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintette for piano and strings, a string quartette, songs, piano pieces, etc.

TIMES,
New York City.
MAR 5 1908

FIEDLER TO SUCCEED MUCK.

Hamburg Conductor Will Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 4.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that August Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Carl Muck, who has been unable to get a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of next season.

This orchestra director, who is also a pianist and composer, was born in Zittau in 1859. He studied the piano with his father and theory and organ playing with G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil in the Leipsic Conservatory. In 1882 he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory, and often appeared publicly as a piano player. He has composed a piano quintet, a string quartet, a symphony in D minor, and several songs and piano pieces.

MARCH 2, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Schumann—"Manfred" Overture.
Dohnanyi—Concert-piece with Violoncello Obligato.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Bischoff—Symphony in E major.

The subject of "Manfred" as treated by Byron appealed with great force to Schumann. Once, while reading it aloud in Dusseldorf, his voice broke and he burst into tears. All through this overture one can easily feel how deeply the picture of human strife and torture, until its final cessation in death, appealed to the composer. The work shows that great musical thoughts can outweigh orchestral routine, for the overture seems to have very weak tints when compared with Bischoff's mastery of the various tone-colors, yet it is decidedly the greater work of the two.

The strong contrasts were made the most of. The character of Manfred is drawn in stormy syncopations full of restlessness and vehemence. Schumann was the master of syncopation, and not Beethoven, nor Chopin, nor the hiccoughy moderns can excel him in this field. Against this picture we have the tender sadness of Astarte, one of the most beautiful themes that the melodic Schumann ever invented. The soft call of the trumpets, like a warning from beyond the grave, the fierce combat that only ends with a picture of death, these are wonderful touches, and Dr. Muck brought them out wonderfully in his reading.

Manfred dies much more effectively in this overture than he does in the cantata that follows. In the vocal score Schumann brings in a Requiem, which is about as fit as it would be at the funeral of the Sultan. This Requiem is moreover as ugly as a pupil's exercise in advanced counterpoint. At its end Manfred dies,—killed by a double canon. We much prefer the suggestion of his death as given in this overture.

The Dohnanyi orchestral composition was the right thing in the wrong place. After the earnestness of the Schumann work one would have enjoyed some brilliant display of technique, some scintillating Violoncello Concerto. This Concerto Piece, however, was subdued, poetic and without attempts at display of virtuosity. It was not in any sense an exciting work. It was artistic abnegation in Mr. Warnke to choose this number, and he played it in a very expressive and praiseworthy manner.

The suavity and refinement of his legato work, the constant care of ensemble and avoidance of undue prominence, were points that the musician would appreciate more fully than the public. The Adagio part of the work was somewhat over-long and it was only near the end that a few martial touches gave brightness to the subdued picture. The cadenza had some harmonics which were beautifully done, and it must be remembered how much more difficult harmonics are upon the cello than upon the violin, because of the thicker strings.

We could have borne a little more breadth in the G string passages, but altogether Mr. Warnke's performance was that of a master. The final shading against the persistent strokes of the kettle-drum (an effect evidently borrowed from Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, second movement) was excellently done. Mr. Warnke was recalled thrice, yet we feel that if the work had come after, say the "Magic Flute" overture, it would have made a much stronger impression.

We also feel that Bischoff's symphony was not fully appreciated, coming as it did, at 9 o'clock, and lasting until after 10 p.m. We feel, however, that this work was worth repetition at some time or other.

Yet there are other works which might take precedence if such repetitions are in order. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for example, well deserves a rehearing. Some but not all, of the public were aware of the absolutely great performance of the symphony that they were hearing. Dr. Muck was at his very greatest in the reading and the men played more brilliantly than we have ever heard them,—which is saying very much.

But the demon of length, which has seized upon all the modern composers, has Mr. Bischoff in thrall, and he has his say in four very long movements, any one of which might be a Symphonic Poem by itself.

In fact the first movement might well be played alone, dropping the scheme of redemption by the love of a noble woman and taking it as a picture of Vagabondia pure (or impure) and simple. It might be entitled "Dissipation"; but it is not the hot bird and cold bottle New York dissipation; it suggests Salamanders, Bier, Seidls, midnight Maennerchoere, the German student's idea of a high old time. That fiercely bacchanalian instrument, the Piccolo, is all the time shrieking; there are constant choruses of nocturnal revellers. The movement has a kinship to "Till Eulenspiegel," and it has a heartiness that would be inspiring enough if it were heard alone.

The composer says that the second movement suggests remorse. If we follow out the above idea it might also suggest Katzenjammer, Haarweh ("Hair-ache") das Graue Elend (Grey Misery), and that state of affairs when the victim desires only a Holland herring and a few kind words for breakfast.

Seriously, however, there is beauty in each movement, but there is also reiteration. The exodus of auditors began at the close of the first movement. It was larger at the end of the second. The third movement was superbly played, and it pictured the furies chasing their victim very much as the gnomes chased Peer Gynt, but with much better orchestral effect than Grieg could attain. But it was again long, long, long, as if the composer were loth to leave his subject. But if the composer could not leave it the auditors could, and there was a distinct pilgrimage outward at the end of this. Dr. Muck looked alternately at the backs of the departing Philistines and at his watch, evidently wishing to see how long the procession took in passing a given point.

At last the finale was begun and played brilliantly to the end. There were enough lovers of modern scoring, and of superb orchestral playing left in the hall to give some hearty applause. The symphony is certainly most strenuous music; it is melodious; it is a masterpiece of scoring; the composer is not a mollycoddle by any means. But if the South could send a few of its most powerful cotton compresses to Europe and have them used on the modern orchestral composers there it would be doing a good deed for the advancement

Louis C. Elson.

POST, THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908

Max Fiedler of Hamburg to Succeed Dr. Muck

After much discussion and conjecture that have invariably as it happened gone wide of the mark, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces as Dr. Muck's successor Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg.

Mr. Fiedler has been under consideration for some time, and on the instant Dr. Muck's return to Europe was irrevocably decided upon by the Kaiser, the Symphony directors pushed the negotiations with the Hamburg leader to a conclusion.

The conductor of next season is well known and highly esteemed throughout Europe, where he has made a reputation as a musician of the highest standing, of the broadest culture and the utmost catholicity of taste.

He comes warmly recommended from every quarter, and Dr. Muck, who was a fellow student with Mr. Fiedler at the Leipsig Conservatory, personally recommended him as his successor in the most complimentary manner.

Mr. Fiedler, however, has not been one to court publicity. It is significant that with all the discussion that has been indulged in of late regarding the new Symphony conductor, his name has hardly been mentioned as a possibility.

This earnest, sincere and hard-working musician has devoted every effort toward reaching the summit in his art. His reputation rests solely upon the things he has accomplished.

Sketch of Fiedler

Born in Zittau, Dec. 31, 1859, the whole life of the man has been devoted to music. Before becoming conductor Mr. Fiedler was famous as one of the leading pianists of Germany, and he takes a high rank as a composer. He commenced to play the piano at a very early age. First lessons were given him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher, in Zittau. Later the young musician took up the study of theory and composition under Albrecht, a celebrated pedagogue, one who wrote music that was highly esteemed a few years ago.

From 1877 to 1880 Fiedler was a pupil at the Leipsic Conservatory, where he took the Holstein scholarship. Here he was a classmate of Dr. Muck and George W. Chadwick, the present director of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Mr. Chadwick, when told of Mr. Fiedler's appointment, said: "Well, I am fortunate in my friends of the Leipsic days. First came Dr. Muck, and now I shall see Mr. Fiedler again. I have not seen him since those student days in 1878-79. At that time he was a very quiet unassuming fellow, and he worked very hard.

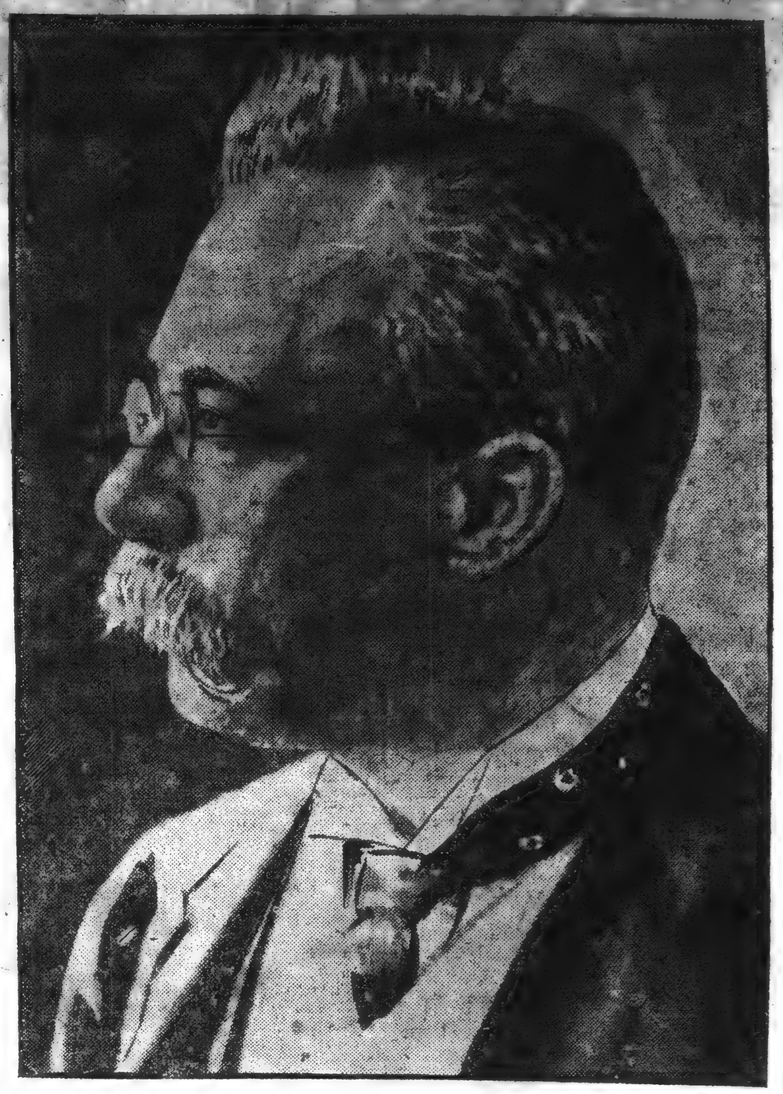
"He looked so delicate that we all expected him to die of consumption. We were the more concerned about this, as Fiedler gave evidence of unusual talent for composition. I remember a quintet for piano and strings by him that was performed at the same concert at which a string quartet of my own was given. He did not conduct at that time.

"His great success of late years in this respect has been a later development of a talent then little suspected."

In 1882 Mr. Fiedler became a member of the faculty of the widely known Hamburg Conservatory, and since 1905 has been the director of that institute.

During these years he appeared frequently as a virtuoso, though much of his time was given to teaching, conducting and composition. His labors in this respect are most prominently represented by a symphony in D, which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintet for piano and strings, a string quartet, songs and piano pieces.

In 1894 he succeeded Richard Barthos, conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra concerts, and he became one of the principal conductors at the opera in that city.



MAX FIEDLER,
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Throughout Europe Mr. Fiedler is known as one of the greatest interpreters of orchestral music. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, Madrid, London, Paris and New York.

He has established a reputation as being a musician solidly grounded in the classics, but a very ardent exponent of the best music that is being produced today.

At concerts of the Philharmonic Society that took place in New York Dec. 15 and 16, 1905, Mr. Fiedler conducted a programme of compositions well known to any casual concert-goer, and he created a furor by his individ... in the least extravagant ... of these works.

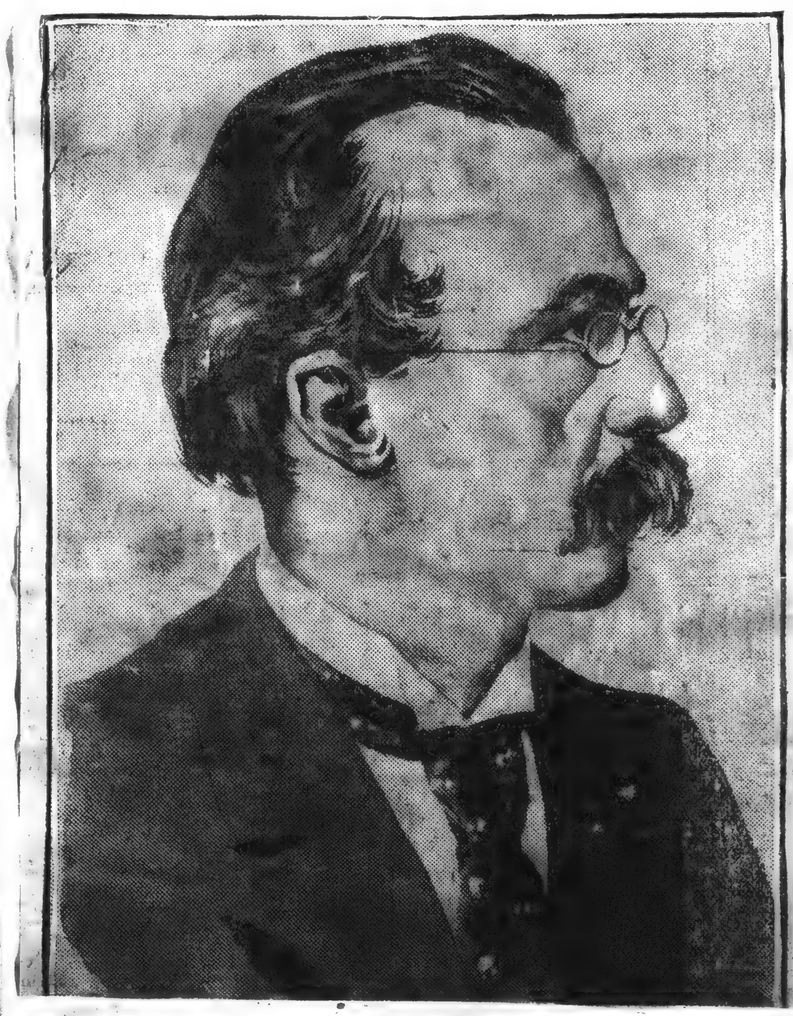
The technical excellence ... formances was also a mat... the time.

Mr. Fiedler, from all hear... of wide experience and know... orchestral repertoire, an ... able drillmaster, and a ma... Judging from indications, it ... that the new conductor is ... fitted to meet the require... position as head of the Boston ... and the music-lovers of this ... confidently look forward to ... ing season.

HERALD—THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908.

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, Who Will Next Season Succeed Dr. Muck. He Was a Fellow-Student with the Latter Who Strongly Recommended Him.



MAX FIEDLER TO SUCCEED DR. MUCK

Hamburg Conductor Engaged to Head Symphony Orchestra Next Season.

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra announced yesterday that arrangements have been completed whereby Max Fiedler of Hamburg becomes the conductor of the orchestra next season.

As soon as it was decided that Dr. Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin, negotiations were begun with Mr. Fiedler, who ranks among the leading conductors of Germany, and was highly recommended by Dr. Muck himself as his successor. Dr. Muck knows him well, as they were students together in the Leipsic Conservatory.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany, and he ranks high as a composer. His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a pupil at the Leipsic Conservatory on the Holstein foundation.

Conductor of Hamburg Opera.

Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg Conservatory and since 1906 he has been its director. During these years he did considerable work as a pianist, but most of his time has been given to teaching and conducting. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg orchestra concerts, and he has served as conductor at the Hamburg Opera House. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York.

In the last named city he conducted the Philharmonic Society on Dec. 15 and 16, 1905, and of the various conductors brought to America by this society none seems to have made a more favorable impression on the musical public of New York. His compositions include a symphony in D minor, which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintet for piano and strings, a string quartet, songs, piano pieces, etc.

Inspires His Men.

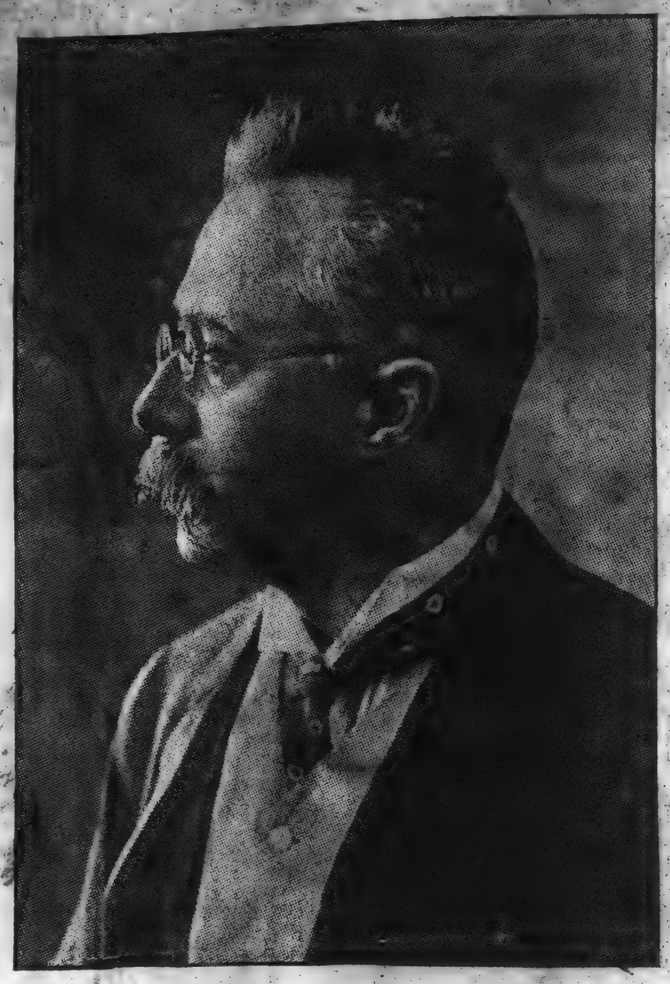
Mr. Fiedler is said to have authority ... a disciplinarian and ...

[57]

GLOBE, THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908

MAX FIEDLER WILL CONDUCT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Management Announces Arrangement With Hamburg Leader For Next Season.



MAX FIEDLER.

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra announces that arrangements have been completed whereby Max Fiedler of Hamburg becomes the conductor of the orchestra next season.

As soon as it was decided that Dr Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin, negotiations were begun with Mr Fiedler, who ranks among the leading conductors of Germany, and was highly recommended by Dr Muck himself as his successor. Dr Muck knows him well as they were students together in the Leipsig conservatory.

Mr Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany, and he ranks high as a composer. His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a pupil at the Leipsig conservatory on the Holstein foundation.

Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg conservatory, and since 1905 he has been its director. During these years he did considerable work as a pianist, but most of his time has been given to teaching and conducting. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg orchestra concerts, and one of the principal conductors of the Hamburg opera. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St Petersburg, London, Paris and New York. In the last named city he conducted for the Philharmonic society, Dec 15 and 16, 1905.

His compositions include a symphony in D minor, which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintet for piano and strings, a string quartet, songs and piano pieces.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON ADVERTISER

1903

Much new music has been performed this season by the Boston Orchestra, under Karl Muck's direction. Among orchestral directors there is a growing disposition to present novelties, if only for the sake of novelty. Additions thus made to the Boston band's repertoire during the current season include Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Elf," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," Rdznicek's Adagio and Scherzo-Poem," Radznicek's Adagio and Scherzo-Finale from his suite in E minor, Ernst Boehe's symphonic poem, "Taormina"; Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage"; D'Ambrosio's concerto for violin in B minor; Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani"; Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and strings; Franck's symphonic piece, "The Redemption"; Bischoff's symphony in E major, three German dances by Mozart, Schelling's fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches", Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme of J. A. Hiller, Schelderup's "Summer Night on a Fjord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, Dohnanyi's concert piece for orchestra, with cello obligato; Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, Hinton's concerto for piano, Balakireff's symphony in C major, Halvorsen's "Fossegrimen," suite for orchestra, and two pieces for orchestra, with viola obligato by Gustav Strube.

tional nature that inspires his men and vitalizes the works performed. He is catholic in his taste; he respects the masters of the past, and he is deeply interested in contemporaneous tendencies and movements. He is a warm admirer of Richard Strauss, but he is not a partisan in the obnoxious meaning of that word.

When he visited New York to conduct two concerts of the Philharmonic Society his programme was as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Strauss' "Don Juan," Beethoven's symphony in C minor. The choice of a symphony by Beethoven was not, perhaps, wholly his own, inasmuch as the concerts were commemorative of Beethoven's birthday.

Mr. Fiedler's distinguishing characteristic as a conductor is said to be his power of suggestion, which he exerts

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

Address .....

Date. MAR 5 1908

HAMBURG CONDUCTOR TO SUCCEED DR. MUCK

York, 1

Mr. Max Fiedler Named as Successor to Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to obtain a longer leave of absence from Berlin.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season.

Mr. Fiedler is known in New York, although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905, and made a success. Mr. George W. Chadwick, of the New England Conservatory of Music, knew him at Leipzig and speaks highly of him.

Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler were fellow students in the Leipzig Conservatory. Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859 and has devoted his life to music. He was a leading pianist in Germany before he became a conductor.

[158]

A PERSONAL IMPRESSION OF MAX FIEDLER

How the New Chief of the Symphony Orchestra Conducted in London Last Summer—His Physical Traits and the Qualities of His Conducting—Two New Germans Whom Boston Is to Hear in April Make Their First Appearance in America—The Passing of the Auditorium in Chicago—A Bit of London Travesty—Concerts to Come and Notes of the Local Theatres—Bronson Howard Writes a New Play

Max Fiedler of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg, who will succeed Dr. Muck at the head of the Symphony Orchestra next year, is the oldest conductor who has yet come freshly to the post. He will be nearly at the end of his fiftieth year when he begins work next autumn. Unlike any of his predecessors, except Mr. Paur, he has had a considerable career and reputation as a concert pianist in Germany before he passed to conducting, fifteen years ago. Unlike all of them, except Mr. Gericke, he has written music in his time, a symphony, and sundry compositions for string quartet and the piano, but happily neither in Hamburg nor in his visits to other cities, has he shown any eagerness to bring them to performance. Like all of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he was educated as a musician, he has lived the life of a practising musician, and he has few interests outside his calling. Again, unlike Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke, his experience has been that of a conductor of orchestral concerts rather than of opera; while like them—to complete the parallel—he comes to Boston as a man high in the second rank rather than in the very first rank of his calling. Weingartner or Nikisch, Mottl or Mahler—to name the four most distinguished "international" conductors—could hardly be persuaded now to our orchestra. Their engagements in the opera house or in other concerts, the price that they set upon themselves, and the conditions they would impose upon their work are all alike in the way. The recourse of our orchestra is to conductors of less widespreading note and exalted notions, but of little less ability and individuality. Such a choice was Mr. Gericke and such in a measure was Dr. Muck. How fully each, and the latter in particular, has justified it is an old story. So in every city in which Mr. Fiedler has appeared, and notably in New York two years, he has much excelled preliminary expectation.

Mr. Fiedler, moreover—and beyond Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck when they came to Boston—has his reputation as an "international" conductor. For ten years he pursued his work in Hamburg. Then the worth of it began to make him known in other German cities, and he conducted on occasion in them. Next it brought him opportunities at Madrid, Rome and Amsterdam; last summer he appeared for the first times in London and to such acceptance that he returned thither last autumn. It was in one of these concerts in England last May that the Transcript's reviewer happened to see and to hear Mr. Fiedler and to receive an impression, that is still clear, of the man and his conducting. To the eye the conductor was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, à la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of vigorous physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit. That afternoon at the Queen's Hall he was conducting with the London Symphony Orchestra for the first titme. The band was new to him and he to the band. He had had, moreover, to change his programme at the last minute. Perhaps all these circumstances compelled him to a vehemence of gesture, movement and physical emphasis of his intentions with the players that is not usual with him. Certainly he conducted at the two Philharmonic concerts that he led in New York in the winter of 1905-06 with far less bodily effort than he seemed to find necessary in London. His beat and his gestures were then clear and expressive; unmistakably they carried his will to his men; but they had a nervous energy that here in Boston (if Mr. Fiedler continues to practice it) will be a new thing after Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck's relatively sober conducting. Alike in London and in New York he quickly discovered the traits and temper of his orchestra and put them in effective play. His men felt him. Imperious and nervous will were in him.

The conductor's programme, when he came to New York comprised Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor. In London the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" also stood upon his list along with Brahms's first symphony in C minor and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. The symphony, however, was a hasty substitute for Strauss's "Heldenleben." It was then said in London—how truly it is impossible to know—that Mr. Fiedler was warmly inclined to ultra-modern music of many schools and that he sought and played it eagerly. The Beethoven and the Brahms of the two programmes quoted suggest no less due loyalty and liking for the classics, and certainly in Germany Mr. Fiedler has the reputation of a broad-minded and "all-round" conductor who cultivates no "specialty" but duly diversified and fairly wide-ranging programmes. Before long we hope to give our readers some examples of his programmes in Hamburg, where he could choose more freely than in either London or New York.

In his conducting in both cities, Mr. [illegible] beauty and euphony of tone, so that by these tokens we in Boston need have no fear for the standards in such respects of our orchestra. Not once in London was the tone of the band harsh, rough, or careless. Nowhere, however, did the beauty, balance and precision of the tone lessen its vitality or its expressive quality. There was the eager and vivid life in it that Dr. Muck has taught us to expect. In Mr. Fiedler himself was a kindred union of traits. His reading of Brahms's symphony, for example, was altogether clear and straightforward. He sought no finicking or disturbing "novelties" of pace or phrase whereby certain conductors would prove their "individuality." Yet, as clearly, he had thoroughly analyzed the music, in his own preparation for it, and discovered and grasped its substance and spirit. Thus prepared, he was ready to bring it to life, and passionate life, in performance. No less understanding, power and imagination shone in his conducting of the "Leonore" and the "Meistersinger" overtures. In both an ardent, dramatizing but ordered temperament was in commanding play. Contrasts and climaxes told, the music went sweepingly and glowingly forward; and yet throughout it kept its salient traits. Here was clearly a conductor of intellectual penetration and grasp on the one hand, and of vigor and passion on the other; above all a conductor who could characterize his music—each piece in its kind. It is such a success or that Dr. Muck has taught us to expect. H. T. F.

GLOBE NEW YORK ZEITUNG

1903

Max Fiedler heißt der Mann.

Ist zum Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchesters, als Nachfolger von Dr. Karl Muck, gewählt worden.

Boston, Mass., 4. März. Die Leitung des Boston Symphony Orchesters machte heute bekannt, daß Herr Max

Max Fiedler.

Fiedler von Hamburg zum Dirigenten des Orchesters gewählt sei. Der bisherige Dirigent, Dr. Karl Muck, hatte vor einiger Zeit seine Resignation eingereicht, da er gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren. Fiedler wird die Leitung des Orchesters in nächster Saison übernehmen.

Der neuerwählte Dirigent ist den amerikanischen Musikfreunden kein Fremder mehr. Er hat bereits früher Reisen durch die Vereinigten Staaten gemacht und hier in New York ein Philharmonie Konzert dirigirt, bei dem er einen großen Erfolg erzielte und sich als ein autoritativer Leiter, der sein Orchester fest in der Hand hat, erwies.

Max Fiedler ist gegenwärtig der Dirigent der Philharmonischen Konzerte und Direktor des Konservatoriums in Hamburg. Er wurde am 31. Dezember 1859 in Zittau geboren. In Petersburg ist er seit mehreren Saisons Konzert-Dirigent der Kaiserlich russischen musikalischen Gesellschaft gewesen.

SUN,

New York City.

MAR 5 1903

FIEDLER FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Hamburg Conductor Chosen to Succeed Dr. Karl Muck.

BOSTON, March 4.—Announcement was made to-night that Max Fiedler of Hamburg is to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. When it was learned that Dr. Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin negotiations were begun with Mr. Fiedler, who holds high rank among the conductors of Germany. He was recommended by Dr. Muck. Dr. Muck knows him well, as they were students together in the Leipsic Conservatory.

Mr. Fiedler is 49 years old and has devoted his whole life to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany. His first lessons were taken from his father, Karl August Fiedler, in Zittau, and he later studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a student at Leipsic, and two years later he became one of the faculty in the Hamburg Conservatory. In 1903 he became its director.

He has appeared in the leading European cities and in New York, where he conducted the Philharmonic Society in December, 1905.

GLOBE THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908

MAX FIEDLER WILL CONDUCT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Management Announces Arrangement With Hamburg Leader For Next Season.

MAX FIEDLER.

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra announces that arrangements have been completed whereby Max Fiedler of Hamburg becomes the conductor of the orchestra next season.

As soon as it was decided that Dr Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin, negotiations were begun with Mr Fiedler, who ranks among the leading conductors of Germany, and was highly recommended by Dr Muck himself as his successor. Dr Muck knows him well as they were students together in the Leipsig conservatory.

Mr Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany, and he ranks high as a composer. His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a pupil at the Leipsig conservatory on the Holstein foundation.

Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg conservatory, and since 1905 he has been its director. During these years he did considerable work as a pianist, but most of his time has been given to teaching and conducting. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg orchestra concerts, and one of the principal conductors of the Hamburg opera. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St Petersburg, London, Paris and New York. In the last named city he conducted for the Philharmonic society, Dec 15 and 16, 1905.

His compositions include a symphony in D minor, which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintet for piano and strings, a string quartet, songs and piano pieces.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1903

Much new music has been performed this season by the Boston Orchestra, under Karl Muck's direction. Among orchestral directors there is a growing disposition to present novelties, if only for the sake of novelty. Additions thus made to the Boston band's repertoire during the current season include Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ Elf," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," Rdznicek's Adagio and Scherzo-Poem," Radznicek's Adagio and Scherzo-Finale from his suite in E minor, Ernst Boehe's symphonic poem, "Taormina"; Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage"; D'Ambrosio's concerto for violin in B minor; Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldonianl"; Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and strings; Franck's symphonic piece, "The Redemption"; Bischoff's symphony in E major, three German dances by Mozart, Schelling's fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches"; Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme of J. A. Hiller, Schelderup's "Summer Night on a Fjord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, Dohnanyi's concert piece for orchestra, with cello obligato; Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, Hinton's concerto for piano, Balakireff's symphony in C major, Halvorsen's "Fossegrimen," suite for orchestra, and two pieces for orchestra, with viola obligato by Gustav Strube.

...nal nature that inspires his men and ...alizes the works performed. He is ...tholic in his taste; he respects the ...asters of the past, and he is deeply ...nterested in contemporaneous tendencies and movements. He is a warm admirer of Richard Strauss, but he is not a partisan in the obnoxious meaning of that word.

When he visited New York to conduct two concerts of the Philharmonic Society his programme was as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Strauss' "Don Juan," Beethoven's symphony in C minor. The choice of a symphony by Beethoven was not, perhaps wholly his own, inasmuch as the concerts were commemorative of Beethoven's birthday.

Mr. Fiedler's distinguishing characteristic as a conductor is said to be his power of suggestion, which he exercises quietly on the orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

Address .....

Date .....

HAMBURG CONDUCTOR TO SUCCEED DR. MUCK York, H

Mr. Max Fiedler Named as Successor to Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to obtain a longer leave of absence from Berlin.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season.

Mr. Fiedler is known in New York, although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905, and made a success. Mr. George W. Chadwick, of the New England Conservatory of Music, knew him at Leipzig and speaks highly of him.

Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler were fellow students in the Leipzig Conservatory. Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859 and has devoted his life to music. He was a leading pianist in Germany before he became a conductor.

[158]

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1908

A PERSONAL IMPRESSION OF MAX FIEDLER

How the New Chief of the Symphony Orchestra Conducted in London Last Summer—His Physical Traits and the Qualities of His Conducting—Two New Germans Whom Boston Is to Hear in April Make Their First Appearance in America—The Passing of the Auditorium in Chicago—A Bit of London Travesty—Concerts to Come and Notes of the Local Theatres—Bronson Howard Writes a New Play

Max Fiedler of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg, who will succeed Dr. Muck at the head of the Symphony Orchestra next year, is the oldest conductor who has yet come freshly to the post. He will be nearly at the end of his fiftieth year when he begins work next autumn. Unlike any of his predecessors, except Mr. Paur, he has had a considerable career and reputation as a concert pianist in Germany before he passed to conducting, fifteen years ago. Unlike all of them, except Mr. Gericke, he has written music in his time, a symphony, and sundry compositions for string quartet and the piano, but happily neither in Hamburg nor in his visits to other cities, has he shown any eagerness to bring them to performance. Like all of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he was educated as a musician, he has lived the life of a practising musician, and he has few interests outside his calling. Again, unlike Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke, his experience has been that of a conductor of orchestral concerts rather than of opera; while like them—to complete the parallel—he comes to Boston as a man high in the second rank rather than in the very first rank of his calling. Weingartner or Nikisch, Mottl or Mahler—to name the four most distinguished "international" conductors—could hardly be persuaded now to our orchestra. Their engagements in the opera house or in other concerts, the price that they set upon themselves, and the conditions they would impose upon their work are all alike in the way. The recourse of our orchestra is to conductors of less widespreading note and exalted notions, but of little less ability and individuality. Such a choice was Mr. Gericke and such in a measure was Dr. Muck. How fully each, and the latter in particular, has justified it is an old story. So in every city in which Mr. Fiedler has appeared, and notably in New York two years, he has much excelled preliminary expectation.

Mr. Fiedler, moreover—and beyond Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck when they came to Boston—has his reputation as an "international" conductor. For ten years he pursued his work in Hamburg. Then the worth of it began to make him known in other German cities, and he conducted on occasion in them. Next it brought him opportunities at Madrid, Rome and Amsterdam; last summer he appeared for the first times in London and to such acceptance that he returned thither last autumn. It was in one of these concerts in England last May that the Transcript's reviewer happened to see and to hear Mr. Fiedler and to receive an impression, that is still clear, of the man and his conducting. To the eye the conductor was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, à la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His face was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of vigorous physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit. That afternoon at the Queen's Hall he was conducting with the London Symphony Orchestra for the first time. The band was new to him and he to the band. He had had, moreover, to change his programme at the last minute. Perhaps all these circumstances compelled him to a vehemence of gesture, movement and physical emphasis of his intentions with the players that is not usual with him. Certainly he conducted at the two Philharmonic concerts that he led in New York in the winter of 1905-06 with far less bodily effort than he seemed to find necessary in London. His beat and his gestures were then clear and expressive; unmistakably they carried his will to his men; but they had a nervous energy that here in Boston (if Mr. Fiedler continues to practice it) will be a new thing after Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck's relatively sober conducting. Alike in London and in New York he quickly discovered the traits and temper of his orchestra and put them in effective play. His men felt him. Imperious and nervous will were in him.

The conductor's programme, when he came to New York comprised Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor. In London the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" also stood upon his list along with Brahms's first symphony in C minor and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. The symphony, however, was a hasty substitute for Strauss's "Heldenleben." It was then said in London—how truly it is impossible to know—that Mr. Fiedler was warmly inclined to ultra-modern music of many schools and that he sought and played it eagerly. The Beethoven and the Brahms of the two programmes quoted suggest no less due loyalty and liking for the classics, and certainly in Germany Mr. Fiedler has the reputation of a broad-minded and "all-round" conductor who cultivates no "specialty" but duly diversified and fairly wide-ranging programmes. Before long we hope to give our readers some examples of his programmes in Hamburg, where he could choose more freely than in either London or New York.

In his conducting in both cities, Mr. [illegible] to seek warmth, beauty and euphony of tone, so that by these tokens we in Boston need have no fear for the standards in such respects of our orchestra. Not once in London was the tone of the band harsh, rough, or careless. Nowhere, however, did the beauty, balance and precision of the tone lessen its vitality or its expressive quality. There was the eager and vivid life in it that Dr. Muck has taught us to expect. In Mr. Fiedler himself was a kindred union of traits. His reading of Brahms's symphony, for example, was altogether clear and straightforward. He sought no finicking or disturbing "novelties" of pace or phrase whereby certain conductors would prove their "individuality." Yet, as clearly, he had thoroughly analyzed the music, in his own preparation for it, and discovered and grasped its substance and spirit. Thus prepared, he was ready to bring it to life, and passionate life, in performance. No less understanding, power and imagination shone in his conducting of the "Leonore" and the "Meistersinger" overtures. In both an ardent, dramatizing but ordered temperament was in commanding play. Contrasts and climaxes told, the music went sweepingly and glowingly forward; and yet throughout it kept its salient traits. Here was clearly a conductor of intellectual penetration and grasp on the one hand, and of vigor and passion on the other; above all a conductor who could characterize his music—each piece in its kind. It is such a success or that Dr. Muck has taught us to expect. H. T. P[illegible] 1903 .....

[illegible] TRANSCRIPT

.....

.....

Max Fiedler heißt der Mann.

Ist zum Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchesters, als Nachfolger von Dr. Karl Muck, gewählt worden.

Boston, Mass., 4. März. Die Leitung des Boston Symphony Orchesters machte heute bekannt, daß Herr Max

Max Fiedler.

Fiedler von Hamburg zum Dirigenten des Orchesters gewählt sei. Der bisherige Dirigent, Dr. Karl Muck, hatte vor einiger Zeit seine Resignation eingereicht, da er gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren. Fiedler wird die Leitung des Orchesters in nächster Saison übernehmen.

Der neuerwählte Dirigent ist den amerikanischen Musikfreunden kein Fremder mehr. Er hat bereits früher Reisen durch die Vereinigten Staaten gemacht und hier in New York ein Philharmonie Konzert dirigirt, bei dem er einen großen Erfolg erzielte und sich als ein autoritativer Leiter, der sein Orchester fest in der Hand hat, erwies.

Max Fiedler ist gegenwärtig der Dirigent der Philharmonischen Konzerte und Direktor des Konservatoriums in Hamburg. Er wurde am 31. Dezember 1859 in Zittau geboren. In Petersburg ist er seit mehreren Saisons Konzert-Dirigent der Kaiserlich russischen musikalischen Gesellschaft gewesen.

SUN,

.....

New York City.

1903 .....

.....

FIEDLER FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Hamburg Conductor Chosen to Succeed Dr. Karl Muck.

BOSTON, March 4.—Announcement was made to-night that Max Fiedler of Hamburg is to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. When it was learned that Dr. Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin negotiations were begun with Mr. Fiedler, who holds high rank among the conductors of Germany. He was recommanded by Dr. Muck. Dr. Muck knows him well, as they were students together in the Leipsic Conservatory.

Mr. Fiedler is 49 years old and has devoted his whole life to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany. His first lessons were taken from his father, Karl August Fiedler, in Zittau, and he later studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a student at Leipsic, and two years later he became one of the faculty in the Hamburg Conservatory. In 1903 he became its director.

He has appeared in the leading European cities and in New York, where he conducted the Philharmonic Society in December, 1905.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
MAR 5- 1908

[illegible] Symphony Leader.
[illegible], March 4.—It was announced [illegible] by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler [illegible] has been engaged as director [illegible] orchestra, to succeed next season [illegible] Karl Muck.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date MAR 6- 1908

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR.

[illegible]ton, March 4.—It was announced to-night by [illegible] management of the Boston Symphony Orches[illegible] that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been en[illegible] as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. [illegible] Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
MAR[illegible] 7. 1908.

Dr. Muck Offers Fine Attractions

Frederick Converse and Katherine Goodson Attract Many to the Symphony Rehearsal.

Symphony Hall was crowded yesterday for the rehearsal because of the triple attractions offered by Dr. Muck. Frederick Converse was given a hearing of his "Jeanne d'Arc," and his wide popularity swelled the crowd. Katherine Goodson, who was a picture in white silk, with glistening gold embroidery, rendered a concerto written by her husband, Mr. Hinton, and MacDowell was honored.

Seen in the entrance crush were Mrs. Hollis Hunnewell, with Mrs. John L. Gardner; Mrs. James T. Bowlker, Mrs. Kirt Dexter, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mary Ashton, Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. George Lee, Miss Wainwright, Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Rosamond Dixey, Mrs. Karl Muck, Mrs. Richard Hamlin Jones, Mademoiselle Celeste Stranahan, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Stewart Baird, Mrs. P. Gooding, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Edwin U. Curtis, Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. B. F. Bates, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Miss Hardy, Mrs. John Reece, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. C. Dowse, Miss Eleanor Cotton, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. W. P. Shreve, Miss Stackpole and many more of the devotees.

POST. SATURDAY,
MARCH 7. 1908

CHANGES IN THE SYMPHONY

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master in place of Mr. Carl Wendling and Mr. Richard Czerwonky.

Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season.

Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to leave was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the orchestra might retain his very valuable services. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer.

Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso.

[illegible]spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 6- 1908

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR.

Director is Engaged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] March 4.—It was announced to-[illegible] management of the Boston [illegible] Orchestra that Max Fiedler [illegible] has been engaged as direc[illegible] orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK PICKS ANGLO-AMERICAN COMPOSERS

Converse with His "Jeanne d' Arc" Music, Hinton with His Piano Concerto, and MacDowell with His "Indian" Suite—Music of the Theatre and Music of the Concert Room—The MacDowell of the Orchestra and the MacDowell of Other Fields and Means—Miss Goodson Reappears

Dr. Muck has invented a new sort of racial programme. Last winter, he had his all-Slav and all-Czech lists, and a fortnight hence in New York, he is to have his all-American. English orchestral composers, academic or unacademic, are too little known or too much neglected on this side of the Atlantic for an all-British list, but such programmes are common enough in London. An English pianist, Miss Goodson, happened to play her English husband's, Arthur Hinton's, concerto at the Symphony Concert yesterday. Before it stood the "Dramatic Scenes" that Mr. Converse has arranged from his music of last year to Percy MacKaye's poetic play, "Jeanne d'Arc." For the end of the concert came MacDowell's "Indian" suite, and thus Dr. Muck made the first Anglo-American programme that it is easy to recall here or anywhere else. Thus he "unified" it, as he seeks usually to do, in a kind of duality, and presumably he was content. Certainly it was no reproach to the Anglo-Saxon race of the three composers that the concert seemed less interesting than most of its recent predecessors. To count each movement of the three pieces separately, as the mathematically musical sometimes do, fourteen "numbers" stood upon the programme, made the concert more than two hours long, and provoked the usual intermezzi of the departing. Mr. Converse's "Dramatic Scenes" would have borne performance in concert no better had a Frenchman happened to sign them. Mr. Hinton's concerto would have been no less glittering tinsel had a Russian set his name to it, and the "Indian" suite would have seemed no less familiar and no less suggestive of the composer's orchestral limitations, had MacDowell lived all his life—and perhaps more happily in the end—at the Wiesbaden of his youth and become as thorough-going a German as Templeton Strong, Arthur Bird and other "American" musicians. None of the three pieces was quite satisfying or quite stimulating, and it was this circumstance rather than mere length that made the concert seem a little dull and kept the applause, except for Miss Goodson herself, rather scanty.

In spite of adaptation and revision for a large orchestra and the concert-room, Mr. Converse's music to "Jeanne d'Arc" remains the music of the theatre it was designed to be. Mr. Converse is still a young composer who takes his work with unobtrusive seriousness, especially when it is work for the theatre, toward which instinct and practice, talents and temperament, more and more prompt him. Your old musical and theatrical hand tosses off incidental and decorative music for what the eminent programmists love to call a "stage play," as easily as he can. Experience has taught him that actor-managers are prone to make havoc of it, and that audiences almost never listen to it. Therefore he approaches his "job" mechanically and accomplishes it no less so. Mr. Converse in the end had his full measure of the misfortunes that make incidental music a vain thing in the theatre, but he undertook and pursued his task as though they might never befall. He did not write music that merely filled the pauses and decorated the lyric movements of Mr. MacKaye's play and of Miss Marlowe's and Mr. Sothern's acting of it. By genuinely sympathetic and recreating imagination, he made his music an integral part of the poetic and dramatic scheme and the poetic and dramatic expression of the piece. Imperfectly, heard as it was in the theatre, played as it was by a small and clumsy band, it helped to link and lead the moods of the successive scenes, to compass the atmosphere that should surround them, to suggest and impart emotion, traits, spirit and circumstance. Intrinsically it was music of the theatre and of a particular piece in the theatre.

Mr. MacKaye's play has passed from the stage, and we fear Mr. Converse's music must soon pass with it. Heard independently in the concert-room, it loses in suggestive and imaginative quality more than it gains by favoring surroundings, and by so understanding and sympathetic a performance as Dr. Muck and his men gave of it. For example, the third of the "Dramatic Scenes" is a "Battle Hymn" in which, apparently, Mr. Converse imagines Jeanne's soldiery and their attendant monks, moving to battle and fighting and winning it to the frowning and striding, confident or exalted measures of the mediæval Latin hymn, "Veni, Creator." He works out his design with the music of the hymn leading to fusion of combat and finally rising triumphant through it—a conventional design, as it seemed yesterday, conventionally executed. Heard in the theatre, where the music followed Jeanne's bidding of her prince to war for France and preceded the camp and battle of the ensuing scene, it caught the listener's imagination at the fall of the curtain and held and moulded it until the curtain rose again. So, too, with the "Pastoral Reverie," as Mr. Converse now calls the second of the "Dramatic Scenes." Heard in the concert room, it is an agreeable idyl, a pensive vision adroitly and fancifully suggested in tones. Heard in the theatre, after the scene under the oak of Domremy, where Jeanne's warrior saints and beckoning angels first call her to her task, it seemed the continuation of her visions as they led and upbore her to her prince's castle. Again the music was of a character, episodes and environment, of a particular dramatic narrative that no imagination in the devising and development, in the contrast or the combination, of melodies can summon.

The other three "scenes" are only in little better case. The [illegible] harmonic suggestion of the "Night Vision" do give the music a delicate life and appeal of its own apart from its place in the original musico-dramatic narrative of Jeanne's troubled slumber, her longing comrade and her protecting archangel. It is hard indeed to recall any music by Mr. Converse, except here and there in "The Pipe of Desire," of such fine texture. The first of the "Dramatic Scenes"—the prelude to the play—half brings moods and pictures that nothing—in the concert room—completes and sharpens. The final "scene" is the epitome and the glorification of a tragedy that the unprepared listener of yesterday could know only in faint outline. Thus, Mr. Converse's music seemed not unlike a well-made garment that lacks the living and individual body upon which only it can fittingly and characteristically hang. Inevitably such an unfilled musical coat seemed of rather conventional cut and had a certain emptiness. Yet how full it is of suggestion, mood and character, how complete and individual it is in its place on the dramatic and poetic form for which it was woven. How imaginative it then seems, those who heard it, albeit imperfectly, in the theatre and with Mr. MacKaye's play can still and warmly recall. Because it is so fully and finely accomplished its purpose, it was a notable achievement in the music of the theatre, but by the same token it cannot be shifted to the concert room and keep all of its life and quality.

Thus far, Mr. Converse has been essentially a composer for orchestra and for the stage. His few songs leave no very keen or lasting impression; his string quartet is more suggestive of skilful and economical workmanship than of any instinctive or acquired aptitude for chamber music. By inner promptings and outward accomplishment he is most truly and fully himself in the larger forms and in dramatic mood and circumstance. So placed, he can make (as he often does in the "Dramatic Scenes") a modicum of inspiration go a long way by the ingenuity, feeling and imagination with which he brings it to orchestral utterance. MacDowell on the other hand, had this instinctive aptitude and feeling for the smaller musical forms and for less dramatic and more lyric mood and circumstance. He is most natural, individual, and of his finest traits in his piano sonatas, his songs, and his short piano pieces. His orchestral pieces seem measurably tours-de-force. They are wrought with thoughtful labor oftener than they spring from decisive imagination and compelling inspiration. By common consent the "Indian" suite of yesterday's concert is the crown of MacDowell's orchestral work. In it he touches a vividness and freedom, a poetry and power that he gained nowhere else in his larger compositions. Yet as the "Indian" suite followed the "Dramatic Scenes" (with only the harmonic gimcracks and the tinsel brilliance of Mr. Hinton's concerto between), it was easy to feel that Mr. Converse had brought his imaginings to fuller orchestral expression than had MacDowell his. In the two particular instances, MacDowell had the more to say and was the more possessed by vivid imaginings and the mood that they awoke and sustained in him. Mr. Converse makes orchestrally much out of imaginatively and comparatively little. MacDowell, even in the relative maturity of the "Indian" suite cannot make the orchestra seem his full, submissive, resourceful, and characteristic medium. The feeling of an expressive tour-de-force will persist.

And to say this is not to abate one jot of admiration for the results that MacDowell, however out of his truer elements, has achieved in the suite. Again yesterday, the "Legend" was as the idealized voice of a wild, strong, ancient and passionate race, idealised in its turn by the poet in tones who was speaking for it. Again the love song haunted like a voice across a still lake through a still and shadowy forest. The savage feet beat; the savage song rose and died and rose again—and thrillingly at Dr. Muck's hands—when MacDowell set his Indians warring. The voice of wild lament that will not be comforted rose from a dark, empty and solitary place in the dirge; and at the end the village had its swift revel (be it Indian or no). Here once and again, perhaps, Dr. Muck, a little sentimentalized the music as he did Mr. Chadwick's very American piece a few weeks ago, but oftener he gave it a vividness that made it spring to life from the printed page. The sombre power, the wild poetry, the note of a high, strong, but primitive and solitary race, all spoke in the performance. And yet, and yet—the music did not bring the full and transporting pleasure, the fine æsthetic satisfactions, the recurring thrill, the sense of a unique and persuasive personality that come warmly and absorbingly from MacDowell's piano sonatas and from some of his "sketches" and "idylls" and songs. He could not make the many and obstinate voices of the orchestra serve him as he could compel the single voice of the piano. He plied them more by will and thought than by instinctive aptitude and feeling. He was no weaver of tonal tapestries, no painter of tonal frescoes. His were the smaller palette and the smaller canvas. The big voice, even when he deliberately chose it, was not his voice. Groves stirred here more truly than forests, a tangled garden more than a prairie. A flash of lyric fancy, a moment of lyric melancholy, a vision of glorified legend, a dream haunted with mystery were more characteristic than savage dance and savage dirge. In matter and in manner the "Indian" suite is MacDowell's orchestral tour-de-force, but like all such feats, it is not quite complete, satisfying, and of the normal man that wrought it. He attempted it sincerely; he achieved it as sincerely and with what power and responsiveness of imagination. But—the listener goes home to open "The Woodland Sketches," or take down "The Four Little Poems." H. T. P.

COMING CONCERTS

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" Again and a New Symphony by Balakireff—Recitals Next Week—The Programme for the Last Kneisel Concert—The Calendar for the Rest of March—Short Pieces for the Next Cecilia Concert

At the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Muck and the orchestra, with Mr. Gebhard added to it at the piano, will repeat Mr. Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," first performed last November. It is the newest of Mr. Loeffler's music; it excels all that has preceded it, except his tone-poem of "The Death of Tintagiles" in fervor of poetic imagination, dramatizing feeling, and accent and potency of musical speech. In some respects it suggested last autumn a new birth of Mr. Loeffler's powers; and it left a very deep and warm impression upon the two audiences that heard it. Next week happily they may hear it again. To begin the concert stands a symphony by Balakireff, the Russian composer of the strictest Slav sect—the only symphony that he has written and the first of his music to come to hearing at the Symphony Concerts, though his fantasia, "Islamey," is familiar in piano recitals, and one of his tone-poems was played at Mrs. Hall's orchestral concert last January. In due course and before the symphony is performed we shall try to give our readers some notion of Balakireff as a composer and a man. The programme ends with the plangent and striding overture that Chabrier wrote in his prime to his Viking opera, "Gwendoline."

On Thursday evening of next week in the Sanders Theatre the Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth of its concerts in Cambridge, and for unusual interest Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, will undertake, for the first time hereabouts, Schumann's concerto, which she added to her repertory last autumn. The purely orchestral numbers of the programme are Haydn's "Surprise," symphony, and at nearly the opposite pole of music, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

RECORD. MONDAY, MARCH 9. 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From L. C. Elson's Review in today's Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Converse—Dramatic Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc."
Hinton—Piano concerto in D minor.
Pianist, Mme. Katharine Goodson.
MacDowell—"Indian Suite."

An American and English programme! For once Germany and Russia and France were put upon the shelf and the Anglo-Saxons ruled. Yet the programme was indigestible in spots.

The new concerto by Mr. Arthur Hinton, although effective in its finale, is a somewhat labored work. It gave very few points of melodic ease; the attention of the auditor was strenuously claimed in every measure. The development of a four-noted kettle-drum figure was not quite so easy to follow as the treatment of a somewhat similar idea by Beethoven in his violin concerto. All through the first movement matters were turgid and not easily grasped. But the second movement was more graceful and dainty with its idealization of a waltz-rhythm and its piquant contrasts.

Mme. Goodson played the work like a consummate artist. Happy the composer who has her as his interpreter. Every point of the work was given with loving care, such as Clara Schumann used to bestow upon the piano works of her great husband. The delicacy of the second movement, the pensive character of the Andante and the tremendous energy of the finale were all excellently given. The bravura of the end was incomparably fine. The audience responded heartily to this climax and recalled Mme. Goodson three times.

[illegible] Most Complete Press Clipping Bureau in the World n [illegible]
ress MAR 5- 1908

TO SUCCEED MUCK.

August Max Fiedler Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, March 5.—It was announced last night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that August Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Carl Muck, who has been unable to get a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of next season.

This orchestra director, who is also a pianist and composer, was born in Zittau in 1859. He studied the piano with his father and theory and organ playing with G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil in the Leipsig Conservatory. In 1882 he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory, and often appeared publicly as a piano player. He has composed a piano quintet, a string quartet, a symphony in D minor, and several songs and piano pieces.

When the New York Philharmonic Society invited directors from other countries to wave the baton over its orchestra in 1905-06, Mr. Fiedler was one of the foreign directors chosen, and he appeared in New York during the year.

[159]

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

New Boston Symphony Leader.
BOSTON, March 4.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed next season Dr. Karl Muck.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR.

Boston, March 4.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1908.

Dr. Muck Offers Fine Attractions

Frederick Converse and Katherine Goodson Attract Many to the Symphony Rehearsal.

Symphony Hall was crowded yesterday for the rehearsal because of the triple attractions offered by Dr. Muck. Frederick Converse was given a hearing of his "Jeanne d'Arc," and his wide popularity swelled the crowd. Katherine Goodson, who was a picture in white silk, with glistening gold embroidery, rendered a concerto written by her husband, Mr. Hinton, and MacDowell was honored.

Seen in the entrance crush were Mrs. Hollis Hunnewell, with Mrs. John L. Gardner; Mrs. James T. Bowlker, Mrs. Wirt Dexter, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mary Ashton, Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. George Lee, Miss Wainwright, Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Rosamond Dixey, Mrs. Karl Muck, Mrs. Richard Hamlin Jones, Marie Celeste Stranahan, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Stewart Baird, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Edwin U. Curtis, Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. B. F. Bates, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Miss Hardy, Mrs. John Reece, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. C. Dowse, Miss Eleanor Cotton, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. W. P. Shreve, Miss Stackpole and many more of the devotees.

POST, SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1908

CHANGES IN THE SYMPHONY

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master in place of Mr. Carl Wendling and Mr. Richard Czerwonky.

Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season.

Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to leave was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the orchestra might retain his very valuable services. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer.

Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible]

[illegible]

FIEDLER SUCCEEDS DR. MUCK.

New Director is Engaged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, March 4.—It was announced tonight by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK PICKS ANGLO-AMERICAN COMPOSERS

Converse with His "Jeanne d' Arc" Music, Hinton with His Piano Concerto, and MacDowell with His "Indian" Suite—Music of the Theatre and Music of the Concert Room—The MacDowell of the Orchestra and the MacDowell of Other Fields and Means—Miss Goodson Reappears

Dr. Muck has invented a new sort of racial programme. Last winter, he had his all-Slav and all-Czech lists, and a fortnight hence in New York, he is to have his all-American. English orchestral composers, academic or unacademic, are too little known or too much neglected on this side of the Atlantic for an all-British list, but such programmes are common enough in London. An English pianist, Miss Goodson, happened to play her English husband's, Arthur Hinton's, concerto at the Symphony Concert yesterday. Before it stood the "Dramatic Scenes" that Mr. Converse has arranged from his music of last year to Percy MacKaye's poetic play, "Jeanne d'Arc." For the end of the concert came MacDowell's "Indian" suite, and thus Dr. Muck made the first Anglo-American programme that it is easy to recall here or anywhere else. Thus he "unified" it, as he seeks usually to do, in a kind of duality, and presumably he was content. Certainly it was no reproach to the Anglo-Saxon race of the three composers that the concert seemed less interesting than most of its recent predecessors. To count each movement of the three pieces separately, as the mathematically musical sometimes do, fourteen "numbers" stood upon the programme, made the concert more than two hours long, and provoked the usual intermezzi of the departing. Mr. Converse's "Dramatic Scenes" would have borne performance in concert no better had a Frenchman happened to sign them. Mr. Hinton's concerto would have been no less glittering tinsel had a Russian set his name to it, and the "Indian" suite would have seemed no less familiar and no less suggestive of the composer's orchestral limitations, had MacDowell lived all his life—and perhaps more happily in the end—at the Wiesbaden of his youth and become as thorough-going a German as Templeton Strong, Arthur Bird and other "American" musicians. None of the three pieces was quite satisfying or quite stimulating, and it was this circumstance rather than mere length that made the concert seem a little dull and kept the applause, except for Miss Goodson herself, rather scanty.

In spite of adaptation and revision for a large orchestra and the concert-room, Mr. Converse's music to "Jeanne d'Arc" remains the music of the theatre it was designed to be. Mr. Converse is still a young composer who takes his work with unobtrusive seriousness, especially when it is work for the theatre, toward which instinct and practice, talents and temperament, more and more prompt him. Your old musical and theatrical hand tosses off incidental and decorative music for what the eminent programmists love to call a "stage play," as easily as he can. Experience has taught him that actor-managers are prone to make havoc of it, and that audiences almost never listen to it. Therefore he approaches his "job" mechanically and accomplishes it no less so. Mr. Converse in the end had his full measure of the misfortunes that make incidental music a vain thing in the theatre, but he undertook and pursued his task as though they might never befall. He did not write music that merely filled the pauses and decorated the lyric movements of Mr. MacKaye's play and of Miss Marlowe's and Mr. Sothern's acting of it. By genuinely sympathetic and recreating imagination, he made his music an integral part of the poetic and dramatic scheme and the poetic and dramatic expression of the piece. Imperfectly heard as it was in the theatre, played as it was by a small and clumsy bnd, it helped to link and lead the moods of the successive scenes, to compass the atmosphere that should surround them, to suggest and impart emotion, traits, spirit and circumstance. Intrinsically it was music of the theatre and of a particular piece in the theatre.

Mr. MacKaye's play has passed from the stage, and we fear Mr. Converse's music must soon pass with it. Heard independently in the concert-room, it loses in suggestive and imaginative quality more than it gains by favoring surroundings, and by so understanding and sympathetic a performance as Dr. Muck and his men gave of it. For example, the third of the "Dramatic Scenes" is a "Battle Hymn" in which, apparently, Mr. Converse imagines Jeanne's soldiery and their attendant monks, moving to battle and fighting and winning it to the frowning and striding, confident or exalted measures of the mediæval Latin hymn, "Veni, Creator." He works out his design with the music of the hymn leading to music of combat and finally rising triumphant through it—a conventional design, as it seemed yesterday, conventionally executed. Heard in the theatre, where the music followed Jeanne's bidding of her prince to war for France and preceded the camp and battle of the ensuing scene, it caught the listener's imagination at the fall of the curtain and held and moulded it until the curtain rose again. So, too, with the "Pastoral Reverie," as Mr. Converse now calls the second of the "Dramatic Scenes." Heard in the concert room, it is an agreeable idyl, a pensive vision adroitly and fancifully suggested in tones. Heard in the theatre, after the scene under the oak of Domrémy, where Jeanne's warrior saints and beckoning angels first call her to her task, it seemed the continuation of her visions as they led and upbore her to her prince's castle. Again the music was of a character, episodes and environment, of a particular dramatic narrative that no imagination in the devising and development, in the contrast or the combination, of melodies can summon.

The other three "scenes" are only in little better case. The shadowy and filmy tonal coloring and the mysterious harmonic suggestion of the "Night Vision" do give the music a delicate life and appeal of its own apart from its place in the original musico-dramatic narrative of Jeanne's troubled slumber, her longing comrade and her protecting archangel. It is hard indeed to recall any music by Mr. Converse, except here and there in "The Pipe of Desire," of such fine texture. The first of the "Dramatic Scenes"—the prelude to the play—half brings moods and pictures that nothing—in the concert room—completes and sharpens. The final "scene" is the epitome and the glorification of a tragedy that the unprepared listener of yesterday could know only in faint outline. Thus, Mr. Converse's music seemed not unlike a well-made garment that lacks the living and individual body upon which only it can fittingly and characteristically hang. Inevitably such an unfilled musical coat seemed of rather conventional cut and had a certain emptiness. Yet how full it is of suggestion, mood and character, how complete and individual it is in its place on the dramatic and poetic form for which it was woven. How imaginative it then seems, those who heard it, albeit imperfectly, in the theatre and with Mr. MacKaye's play can still and warmly recall. Because it is so fully and finely accomplished its purpose, it was a notable achievement in the music of the theatre, but by the same token it cannot be shifted to the concert room and keep all of its life and quality.

Thus far, Mr. Converse has been essentially a composer for orchestra and for the stage. His few songs leave no very keen or lasting impression; his string quartet is more suggestive of skilful and economical workmanship than of any instinctive or acquired aptitude for chamber music. By inner promptings and outward accomplishment he is most truly and fully himself in the larger forms and in dramatic mood and circumstance. So placed, he can make (as he often does in the "Dramatic Scenes") a modicum of inspiration go a long way by the ingenuity, feeling and imagination with which he brings it to orchestral utterance. MacDowell on the other hand, had this instinctive aptitude and feeling for the smaller musical forms and for less dramatic and more lyric mood and circumstance. He is most natural, individual, and of his finest traits in his piano sonatas, his songs, and his short piano pieces. His orchestral pieces seem measurably tours-de-force. They are wrought with thoughtful labor oftener than they spring from decisive imagination and compelling inspiration. By common consent the "Indian" suite of yesterday's concert is the crown of MacDowell's orchestral work. In it he touches a vividness and freedom, a poetry and power that he gained nowhere else in his larger compositions. Yet as the "Indian" suite followed the "Dramatic Scenes" (with only the harmonic gimcracks and the tinsel brilliance of Mr. Hinton's concerto between), it was easy to feel that Mr. Converse had brought his imaginings to fuller orchestral expression than had MacDowell his. In the two particular instances, MacDowell had the more to say and was the more possessed by vivid imaginings and the mood that they awoke and sustained in him. Mr. Converse makes orchestrally much out of imaginatively and comparatively little. MacDowell, even in the relative maturity of the "Indian" suite cannot make the orchestra seem his full, submissive, resourceful, and characteristic medium. The feeling of an expressive tour-de-force will persist.

And to say this is not to abate one jot of admiration for the results that MacDowell, however out of his truer elements, has achieved in the suite. Again yesterday, the "Legend" was as the idealized voice of a wild, strong, ancient and passionate race, idealized in its turn by the poet in tones who was speaking for it. Again the love song haunted like a voice across a still lake through a still and shadowy forest. The savage feet beat; the savage song rose and died and rose again—and thrillingly at Dr. Muck's hands—when MacDowell set his Indians warring. The voice of wild lament that will not be comforted rose from a dark, empty and solitary place in the dirge; and at the end the village had its swift revel (be it Indian or no). Here once and again, perhaps, Dr. Muck, a little sentimentalized the music as he did Mr. Chadwick's very American piece a few weeks ago, but oftener he gave it a vividness that made it spring to life from the printed page. The sombre power, the wild poetry, the note of a high, strong, but primitive and solitary race, all spoke in the performance. And yet, and yet—the music did not bring the full and transporting pleasure, the fine æsthetic satisfactions, the recurring thrill, the sense of a unique and persuasive personality that come warmly and absorbingly from MacDowell's piano sonatas and from some of his "sketches" and "idylls" and songs. He could not make the many and obstinate voices of the orchestra serve him as he could compel the single voice of the piano. He plied them more by will and thought than by instinctive aptitude and feeling. He was no weaver of tonal tapestries, no painter of tonal frescoes. His were the smaller palette and the smaller canvas. The big voice, even when he deliberately chose it, was not his voice. Groves stirred here more truly than forests, a tangled garden more than a prairie. A flash of lyric fancy, a moment of lyric melancholy, a vision of glorified legend, a dream haunted with mystery were more characteristic than savage dance and savage dirge. In matter and in manner the "Indian" suite is MacDowell's orchestral tour-de-force, but like all such feats, it is not quite complete, satisfying, and of the normal man that wrought it. He attempted it sincerely; he achieved it as sincerely and with what power and responsiveness of imagination. But—the listener goes home to open "The Woodland Sketches," or take down "The Four Little Poems." H. T. P.

COMING CONCERTS

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" Again and a New Symphony by Balakireff—Recitals Next Week—The Programme for the Last Kneisel Concert—The Calendar for the Rest of March—Short Pieces for the Next Cecilia Concert

At the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Muck and the orchestra, with Mr. Gebhard added to it at the piano, will repeat Mr. Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," first performed last November. It is the newest of Mr. Loeffler's music; it excels all that has preceded it, except his tone-poem of "The Death of Tintageles" in fervor of poetic imagination, dramatizing feeling, and accent and potency of musical speech. In some respects it suggested last autumn a new birth of Mr. Loeffler's powers; and it left a very deep and warm impression upon the two audiences that heard it. Next week happily they may hear it again. To begin the concert stands a symphony by Balakireff, the Russian composer of the strictest Slav sect—the only symphony that he has written and the first of his music to come to hearing at the Symphony Concerts, though his fantasia, "Islamey," is familiar in piano recitals, and one of his tone-poems was played at Mrs. Hall's orchestral concert last January. In due course and before the symphony is performed we shall try to give our readers some notion of Balakireff as a composer and a man. The programme ends with the plangent and striding overture that Chabrier wrote in his prime to his Viking opera, "Gwendoline."

On Thursday evening of next week in the Sanders Theatre the Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth of its concerts in Cambridge, and for unusual interest Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, will undertake, for the first time hereabouts, Schumann's concerto, which she added to her repertory last autumn. The purely orchestral numbers of the programme are Haydn's "Surprise," symphony, and at nearly the opposite pole of music, Rimsky-[illegible] "Spanish Caprice."

RECORD, MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From L. C. Elson's Review in today's Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Converse—Dramatic Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc."
Hinton—Piano concerto in D minor.
Pianist, Mme. Katharine Goodson.
MacDowell—"Indian Suite."

An American and English programme! For once Germany and Russia and France were put upon the shelf and the Anglo-Saxons ruled. Yet the programme was indigestible in spots.

The new concerto by Mr. Arthur Hinton, although effective in its finale, is a somewhat labored work. It gave very few points of melodic ease; the attention of the auditor was strenuously claimed in every measure. The development of a four-noted kettle-drum figuré was not quite so easy to follow as the treatment of a somewhat similar idea by Beethoven in his violin concerto. All through the first movement matters were turgid and not easily grasped. But the second movement was more graceful and dainty with its idealization of a waltz-rhythm and its piquant contrasts.

Mme. Goodson played the work like a consummate artist. Happy the composer who has her as his interpreter. Every point of the work was given with loving care, such as Clara Schumann used to bestow upon the piano works of her great husband. The delicacy of the second movement, the pensive character of the Andante and the tremendous energy of the finale were all excellently given. The bravura of the end was incomparably fine. The audience responded heartily to this climax and recalled Mme. Goodson three times.

The Most Extensive and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

TO SUCCEED MUCK.

August Max Fiedler Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, March 5.—It was announced last night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that August Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Carl Muck, who has been unable to get a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of next season.

This orchestra director, who is also a pianist and composer, was born in Zittau in 1859. He studied the piano with his father and theory and organ playing with G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil in the Leipsig Conservatory. In 1882 he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory, and often appeared publicly as a piano player. He has composed a piano quintet, a string quartet, a symphony in D minor, and several songs and piano pieces.

When the New York Philharmonic Society invited directors from other countries to wave the baton over its orchestra in 1905-06, Mr. Fiedler was one of the foreign directors chosen, and he appeared in New York during the year.

[159]

POST, MARCH 8, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music by English and American Composers

At the 17th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra Miss Katherine Goodson, pianist, was soloist, and the programme consisted of music by English and American composers of the present day. Two of these, Arthur Hinton, the Englishman, and F. S. Converse, were present. The third; alas, might have been, had not the summons that no mortal may disobey cut off at an untimely hour the career of the greatest American composer of the period.

Mr. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc, Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra," was given for the first time at these concerts. This suite consists of excerpts from incidental music written to accompany the performance of Percy Mackaye's drama when given by Sothern and Marlowe in 190[illegible]. The suite was performed under Mr. Wallace Goodrich at a Jordan Hall orchestral concert last January, and it has since been revised. Mr. Converse has made cuts in the opening movement and has altered passages in the "Battle Hymn."

It is the opinion of the writer that Mr. Converse, in his greatest moments, has never surpassed this work inspired, you might say, by the Maid of Orleans. The noble subject has touched an answering chord in him, and has given rise to the most dramatic, imaginative and exalted expression of his genius. It is regrettable that an opera on the subject is, in the estimation of the composer, an impracticability, for Mr. Converse has genuine dramatic impulse, and great conceptions that could hardly, it seems, be given more congenial outlet than by this lofty theme.

Some of this music would undoubtedly gain by the aid of the visible drama. The "Battle Hymn," for example, which is essentially theatrical in the highest sense of the word, and even the very ideal music of the "Night Vision" bring to mind impressive scenes and action. In the latter case those who are receptive, accustomed to the marvellous speech of the modern orchestra, and sensitive to the psychology of tone, will be thrilled through and through by the atmospheric night music and the radiant burst that accompanies, presumably, the appearance of the glorious image of St. Michael. To the large public familiar only through a programme book with the every incident of the drama, and but capable of general musical impressions, each measure of the music will probably have less significance.

This, however, is not meant to imply a lack of fantasy or suggestion. From the vesper hymn that opens the first movement, "In Domremy" to the last solemn drumbeat of the apotheosis one is carried to another land and other souls. This is not a garish concert hall; there are not cars and carriages rattling by outside. You are in a nobler time and place. Anything more truly imaginative and poetic—and more sheerly musical—than this prelude would be hard to conceive. Do we realize how grateful we should be for such music? For music that uplifts, that gives us painful visions of greater things.

The Pastorale, in idyllic vein, is very original in treatment and instrumentation. The final movement, "The Maid of God," the apotheosis and culmination of all, has a richness of imagery, a ceremonial splendor, an emotional poignancy and grandeur of conception that go to make a monumental creation.

These terms are very sounding—and possibly extreme. The subject of Jeanne d'Arc is very thrilling, the thought of it sufficient to predispose one to listen favorably; yet while realizing the appropriateness of caution in discussing a work heard for the second time, I cannot refrain from saying that there should be no limitations to the possibilities of a composer capable of writing such music.

Mr. Hinton's piano concerto, which was also given for the first time at these concerts, intensified the impression that it made when played by his wife for the first time in this country last fall at the Worcester festival. The concerto is symphonic in treatment and very clever in its workmanship, which is of no mean order. The same thing cannot be said of the melodic material. You will look in vain for a theme of the long line and big curve. The most interesting melody which partakes of the character of a folk-tune is to be found in the slow movement that induces the finale. So numerous and frequently complicated are the devices of development that the trend of the composer's thought is not always to be easily followed. It does not seem to me that there is a great deal of inventive originality in this work. It impresses rather as the putting forth of a musician well versed in his craft, familiar with scores, and abreast of the tendencies of the day. It is ambitiously designed and it commands respect. Played as Miss Goodson played it—she played like a human whirlwind, and with the might of ten—it is telling, and compels applause. The handling of the solo instrument and the orchestra is masterly, for while the latter has the most to say, the instrumentation being very heavy and brilliant, the solo instrument always shows out. Given, be it said again, a pianist with the nervous force and endurance of Miss Goodson, for there are few more difficult and taxing piano concertos in existence. The work and the performer were well received.

Of the MacDowell "Indian" Suite, which concluded the programme, there is little new than can be said. It was given last year and interpreted with Dr. Muck's characteristic insight, but the performance on this occasion was even more remarkable.

MacDowell rebelled against the title of American Composer. He justly asseverated that music which is good is good, and music that is bad, bad, whatever be its origin. Yet this suite may be called genuinely American. It is the sweet, clean music of the lover and companion of the pine forests, the mountains, and the sea that crashes on a great and untainted land. The Indian melodies utilized here and there are rather in the nature of poetic reminiscence than any endeavor to apply a national or aboriginal trade mark.

HEINRICH GEBHARD PIANIST.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the 18th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Balikereff's symphony in C will be performed for the first time in this city. Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, will be repeated, with the assistance of Mr. Heinrich Gebhard. Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline" will conclude the concert. The name of Balikereff, one of the leading Russian composers, will appear for the first time on the Symphony programmes. He is generally accepted as the founder of the modern Russian school. This symphony is the only work of the composer in that form. It is dated April 23, 1898, and is inscribed to Tertius Philippov. It was played for the first time in this country by the Chicago Orchestra, Jan. 23, 1898.

In addition to the new conductor, there will be other important changes in the personnel of the orchestra next season. Mr. Carl Wendling, the concertmeister, has decided that he will not stay in America next winter, and in this he is influenced by family reasons. Mr. Wendling expects next summer to be concertmeister at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. His place will in all probability be filled by Mr. Hess, who expects to return in time for the opening of next season.

Mr. Czerwonky, the second concertmeister, will resign in order to devote himself to a virtuoso career. Mr. Czerwonky acts wisely. His successor has not yet been chosen.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

MARCH 9, 1908

Miss Goodson at the Symphony Concert

Miss Goodson and the orchestra repeated her husband's piano concerto at the Symphony concert of Saturday night, but it proved no more interesting at a third hearing than it had on Friday afternoon or five months ago at its original performance in America at Worcester. Two virtues it has—it "sounds" and it gives the pianist due opportunity to prove artistry and resource. Many of the old and classic piano concertos, lightly scored for small orchestras in small rooms, or scored with little sense of instrumental values as we now understand them, seem paler and thinner orchestrally at every petition. On the other hand, some ultra-modern concertos merely add a piano to the orchestra and then swamp it. Mr. Hinton escapes either pitfall; his concerto "sounds" clearly and discreetly, and it gives the pianist—and so far that pianist has always been Miss Goodson—range for finesse and for power, for variety of tone, rhythm and shading. So far as the concerto goes, it does gain its end as a virtuoso-piece. The weakness—and the weariness—of it is its lack of definiteness. Freedom of form, freshness of harmony, elasticity of modulation, are all admirable things. Much music that won the ear and stirred the fancy has been so written; but most of it had also a definiteness and a pungency of melodic invention and a warm and communicating mood that Mr. Hinton misses. On he goes with his subjects and counter-subjects, his modulations and progressions, and they leave barely a trace behind of any melodic idea, or any tangible musical thought. The concerto has four movements and episodes diversify some of them, but not one maintains or imparts any alluring or compelling mood. Miss Goodson played the piano part as one who would persuade her hearers to believe in it as she believes in it herself, to find in it what she tries to find. Dr. Muck and the orchestra seconded her to the full. They indeed brought sometimes a semblance of musical and emotional life into what, less sympathetically handled, might have seemed dry bones. Mr. Hinton could hardly complain of the performance. Rather, it was for the audience, recalling Miss Goodson in Grieg's concerto, last year, to complain of the music in which she had returned.

H. T. P.

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE, MD

MAR. 5- 1908

Dr. Karl Muck's Successor.

Boston, Mass., March 4.—It was announced tonight by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Longest of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Converse, MacDowell and Hinton Represented.

Grand Opera Promises—Current Events.

Dr Muck's Anglo-American Symphony program, the 17th of the season, was of generous proportions, nearly two and one-quarter hours being required for playing the "Jeanne d'Arc" scenes by Frederick S. Converse, Arthur Hinton's D minor concerto for piano and orchestra and Edward MacDowell's "Indian" orchestral suite. Mme Katharine Goodson played the piano part in the Hinton concerto, which represented the English division of the program. This and the Converse work were given for the first times at these concerts.

Mr Converse originally wrote the "Jeanne d'Arc" music for the drama produced by Miss Marlowe and Mr Sothern in 1906 and subsequently the composer revised his work and amplified it for a large orchestra. Since it was performed in Jordan hall about a year ago further changes have been made in portions of the score, but the fundamental structure remains the same, and its idylic tone pictures suggesting incidents in the life of the French girl heroine and martyr are again welcome, and especially so when shown in vivid and effective contrasts, which was the case under Dr Muck's direction.

The five divisions are admirably varied. In the first the hint at battles to come is skilfully woven into the gentler measures representing peace, the latter idea being developed in pastoral form in the succeeding part. The vigor of the battle hymn and tumult and din of battle are splendidly set forth in the instrumentation of the third movement; the mystery and confusion in the "Night Vision" is typically weird and suggestive of the scene where Jeanne is sleeping in the woods and visions flit across her weary brain.

In the "resume" in the finale Mr Converse handles skilfully former material in new combinations, working up a grand climax just before the exquisite melody at the close which is in the nature of an apotheosis. The work is one of great merit, and although modern and very effective is not abstruse and overburdened with dissonants and cross-harmonies to produce effects. The former commendation of the "scenes" holds good now, and the orchestral work brought out in new light their many fine passages.

Mme Goodson, as soloist in the Hinton piano concerto, gave a brilliant exhibition of her attainments, in which the velocity of finger work under various conditions was dazzling; and the facility of technique did not impair the limpidity of playing in pianissimo, which is frequently the case. And in chord passages in fortissimo she was in most instances able to hold her own with the orchestra.

The concerto, which was written by her husband, shows Mme Goodson's abilities to excellent advantage; but she has already proved herself an artist of exceptional power and a general encomium for her performance as a whole really is praise enough at this time. The beauty of her crisp, delicate and sparkling pianissimo in the second movement will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it, and the energy and verve of the last movement was nearly as effective, when association with the orchestra is considered. The artist was rapturously applauded and called back several times.

The "Indian" suite by MacDowell is familiar, but a repetition of this sterling work again shows its worth as a contribution to musical literature. Conceived in a broad and patriotic spirit, the lamented composer worked out ideals according to his own high standard, and illustrated his pictures in a musical form, full of poetic characteristics.

All in all, the orchestra was more satisfactory in interpreting this work than in the other two. The quaint and typical "Indian" motifs, the "love song," which gave the wood winds their chances; the roughly strenuous war-time dances, which gave all the intonements something to do, and the "Dirge" were each made interesting, and held the auditors despite the length of the program. And the jollity of the "Village Festival" was indisputably in evidence, so gayly was it rushed through.

For the first time the name of Balakireff, one of the leading Russian composers, will appear on a Boston Symphony program this week. He will be represented by his symphony in C minor, the one work of the kind he has written. It was played for the first time in this country by the Chicago orchestra in January, 1907, and was announced for performance by the Russian society in New York, but for some reason was not given.

Mr Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," which had such a success at the symphony concerts earlier in the season, will be repeated, with Mr Gebhard as pianist. The final number on the program will be Chabrier's overture "Gwendoline."

concert master at the Bayreuth festival. The nerves of his left arm have troubled him of late. As The Herald stated some days ago, Mr. Czerwonky, the second concert master, will leave at the end of this season to pursue the career of a virtuoso. The two successors will not be chosen proba-

[illegible until late in the sp[illegible]

[160]

'JEANNE D'ARC' AT SYMPHONY HALL

Converse's Suite of Dramatic Scenes Given at 17th Concert.

ORCHESTRA EXCELLED IN MacDOWELL'S 'DIRGE'

Many Considered His 'Indian' Suite a Touching Memorial Service.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes.....Converse
Concerto for piano.....Hinton
"Indian" Suite.....MacDowell

Mr. Converse's suite is taken from the music to Percy Mackaye's drama, which was produced in Philadelphia and played here a little over a year ago at the Boston Theatre, with Julia Marlowe as the Maid of Orleans. Mr. Sothern at the time was anxious that his plays should have appropriate music, and he provided an orchestra of respectable size, for a playhouse, and a competent conductor. Unfortunately he did not reckon on the indifference of the audience.

In Boston the entr'actes were heard with difficulty by those who were interested in Mr. Converse and his work. Some men left their seats, presumably in search of fresh air, and returned smelling of fireworks. Others entertained the women in their charge by finding fault with the drama and by diverting gossip. There was much coughing. The music was lost in the din. Soon after this performance the suite was played at an orchestral concert, led by Mr. Goodrich, in Jordan Hall, and it then made a pleasing impression, as descriptive or suggestive music without any inevitable association with the play that called it into being. The performance last night confirmed this impression.

Mr. Converse has not attempted to compose a symphonic poem in five movements, a work laid out on broad lines. He has not endeavored to explain in music the singular theory of Dr. Icard concerning the cause of Jeanne's hallucinations, nor do his scenes purport to be deeply psychological. He wrote music for a drama and with the playhouse in view. His music should be taken in the spirit in which it was composed.

Let it be granted at once that the "Battle Hymn" is purely theatrical and without marked significance for concert purposes, and that as a concert piece the interest of the finale is not sustained from the beginning to the end. Yet in this very finale there are beautiful pages and the ending has genuine pathos.

The other movements, "In Domremy," "Pastoral Reverie" and "Night Visions," have excellent qualities. The melodic lines are clear, flowing and individual. There is a sense of dramatic contrast and a marked richness of orchestral color; above all there is the successful expression of a sympathy with a heroine, a sympathy that is not allowed to become either weakly sentimental or bombastically heroic; in a word there is the expression that comes from the exercise of the imaginative faculty.

Nor is it necessary to know the text of the drama in order to share the various moods of the composer. Furthermore, in his expression of thought Mr. Converse is here freer and more spontaneously poetic both in lyric flight and in poignant suggestion than in some of his more important and preceding works. The overture would be a more complete and rounded whole if the last few measures were omitted. They are not only superfluous; they change, and without effect, the mood and line of thought which a sensitive hearer feels should bring the logical inevitable conclusion.

There are charming orchestral pictures throughout the work. The blending of timbres and the succession of timbres are often arranged with uncommon skill; this is to be observed especially in the "Pastoral Reverie." It should also be remarked that although Mr. Converse employs a very large orchestra, some of his most striking effects are gained by apparently simple means; by an exquisite sense of the value of tints and demi-tints in his orchestral painting.

Mr. Hinton's concerto was played in Boston for the first time. When it was played at the last Worcester festival by Mme. Katharine Goodson, the composer's wife and the pianist of last evening, the piece seemed well suited to the virtuoso's purposes. Last night the concerto seemed on the whole laboriously constructed, without real melodic charm; music that is not a lucid expression of the composer's intentions, however honorable they may have been; music that suggested manufacture by contract labor. Mme. Goodson played with nervous energy and brilliance of mechanism, and displayed a spirit of wifely devotion.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a most eloquent interpretation of the "Dirge" in MacDowell's "Indian" suite. The "Dirge" itself is the crowning glory of a highly original and engrossing work. This lamentation might be that of the dying race. There is nothing of the luxury of woe; there is no conventional music for "threadbare crape and tears." There is the dignity of man who has been familiar with nature, who has known the voices of the day and of the night on lonely prairie and in sombre forest. There is serene yielding to fate.

To many in the audience this performance was the most touching of memorial services in honor of the dead composer.

"Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
And burned is Apollo's laurel bough."

MUSIC NOTES.

Mr. Wendling, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will return to Stuttgart at the end of the season and will not come back. His decision, regretted by many, rests exclusively on [illegible] reasons. If he is in good [illegible]

POST, MARCH 8, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music by English and American Composers

At the 17th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra Miss Katherine Goodson, pianist, was soloist, and the programme consisted of music by English and American composers of the present day. Two of these, Arthur Hinton, the Englishman, and F. S. Converse, were present. The third, alas, might have been, had not the summons that no mortal may disobey cut off at an untimely hour the career of the greatest American composer of the period.

Mr. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc, Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra," was given for the first time at these concerts. This suite consists of excerpts from incidental music written to accompany the performance of Percy Mackaye's drama when given by Sothern and Marlowe in 1906. The suite was performed under Mr. Wallace Goodrich at a Jordan Hall orchestral concert last January, and it has since been revised. Mr. Converse has made cuts in the opening movement and has altered passages in the "Battle Hymn."

It is the opinion of the writer that Mr. Converse, in his greatest moments, has never surpassed this work inspired, you might say, by the Maid of Orleans. The noble subject has touched an answering chord in him, and has given rise to the most dramatic, imaginative and exalted expression of his genius. It is regrettable that an opera on the subject is, in the estimation of the composer, an impracticability, for Mr. Converse has genuine dramatic impulse, and great conceptions that could hardly, it seems, be given more congenial outlet than by this lofty theme.

Some of this music would undoubtedly gain by the aid of the visible drama. The "Battle Hymn," for example, which is essentially theatrical in the highest sense of the word, and even the very ideal music of the "Night Vision" bring to mind impressive scenes and action. In the latter case those who are receptive, accustomed to the marvellous speech of the modern orchestra, and sensitive to the psychology of tone, will be thrilled through and through by the atmospheric night music and the radiant burst that accompanies, presumably, the appearance of the glorious image of St. Michael. To the large public familiar only through a programme book with the every incident of the drama, and but capable of general musical impressions, each measure of the music will probably have less significance.

This, however, is not meant to imply a lack of fantasy or suggestion. From the vesper hymn that opens the first movement, "In Domremy" to the last solemn drumbeat of the apotheosis one is carried to another land and other souls. This is not a garish concert hall; there are not cars and carriages rattling by outside. You are in a nobler time and place. Anything more truly imaginative and poetic—and more sheerly musical—than this prelude would be hard to conceive. Do we realize how grateful we should be for such music? For music that uplifts, that gives us painful visions of greater things.

The Pastorale, in idyllic vein, is very original in treatment and instrumentation. The final movement, "The Maid of God," the apotheosis and culmination of all, has a richness of imagery, a ceremonial splendor, an emotional poignancy and grandeur of conception that go to make a monumental creation.

These terms are very sounding—and possibly extreme. The subject of Jeanne d'Arc is very thrilling, the thought of it sufficient to predispose one to listen favorably; yet while realizing the appropriateness of caution in discussing a work heard for the second time, I cannot refrain from saying that there should be no limitations to the possibilities of a composer capable of writing such music.

Mr. Hinton's piano concerto, which was also given for the first time at these concerts, intensified the impression that it made when played by his wife for the first time in this country last fall at the Worcester festival. The concerto is symphonic in treatment and very clever in its workmanship, which is of no mean order. The same thing cannot be said of the melodic material. You will look in vain for a theme of the long line and big curve. The most interesting melody which partakes of the character of a folk-tune is to be found in the slow movement that induces the finale. So numerous and frequently complicated are the devices of development that the trend of the composer's thought is not always to be easily followed. It does not seem to me that there is a great deal of inventive originality in this work. It impresses rather as the putting forth of a musician well versed in his craft, familiar with scores, and abreast of the tendencies of the day. It is ambitiously designed and it commands respect. Played as Miss Goodson played it—she played like a human whirlwind, and with the might of ten—it is telling, and compels applause. The handling of the solo instrument and the orchestra is masterly, for while the latter has the most to say, the instrumentation being very heavy and brilliant, the solo instrument always shows out. Given, be it said again, a pianist with the nervous force and endurance of Miss Goodson, for there are few more difficult and taxing piano concertos in existence. The work and the performer were well received.

Of the MacDowell "Indian" Suite," which concluded the programme, there is little new than can be said. It was given last year and interpreted with Dr. Muck's characteristic insight, but the performance on this occasion was even more remarkable.

MacDowell rebelled against the title of American Composer. He justly asseverated that music which is good is good, and music that is bad, bad, whatever be its origin. Yet this suite may be called genuinely American. It is the sweet, clean music of the lover and companion of the pine forests, the mountains, and the sea that crashes on a great and untainted land. The Indian melodies utilized here and there are rather in the nature of poetic reminiscence than any endeavor to apply a national or aboriginal trade mark. "He is made one with nature."

HEINRICH GEBHARD
PIANIST.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the 18th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Balikereff's symphony in C will be performed for the first time in this city. Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, will be repeated, with the assistance of Mr. Heinrich Gebhard. Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline" will conclude the concert. The name of Balikereff, one of the leading Russian composers, will appear for the first time on the Symphony programmes. He is generally accepted as the founder of the modern Russian school. This symphony is the only work of the composer in that form. It is dated April 23, 1898, and is inscribed to Tertius Philippov. It was played for the first time in this country by the Chicago Orchestra, Jan. 23, 1898.

In addition to the new conductor, there will be other important changes in the personnel of the orchestra next season. Mr. Carl Wendling, the concertmeister, has decided that he will not stay in America next winter, and in this he is influenced by family reasons. Mr. Wendling expects next summer to be concertmeister at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. His place will in all probability be filled by Mr. Hess, who expects to return in time for the opening of next season.

Mr. Czerwonky, the second concertmeister, will resign in order to devote himself to a virtuoso career. Mr. Czerwonky acts wisely. His successor has not yet been chosen.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1908

Miss Goodson at the Symphony Concert

Miss Goodson and the orchestra repeated her husband's piano concerto at the Symphony concert of Saturday night, but it proved no more interesting at a third hearing than it had on Friday afternoon or five months ago at its original performance in America at Worcester. Two virtues it has—it "sounds" and it gives the pianist due opportunity to prove artistry and resource. Many of the old and classic piano concertos, lightly scored for small orchestras in small rooms, or scored with little sense of instrumental values as we now understand them, seem paler and thinner orchestrally at every petition. On the other hand, some ultra-modern concertos merely add a piano to the orchestra and then swamp it. Mr. Hinton escapes either pitfall; his concerto "sounds" clearly and discreetly, and it gives the pianist —and so far that pianist has always been Miss Goodson—range for finesse and for power, for variety of tone, rhythm and shading. So far as the concerto goes, it does gain its end as a virtuoso-piece. The weakness—and the weariness—of it is its lack of definiteness. Freedom of form, freshness of harmony, elasticity of modulation, are all admirable things. Much music that won the ear and stirred the fancy has been so written; but most of it had also a definiteness and a pungency of melodic invention and a warm and communicating mood that Mr. Hinton misses. On he goes with his subjects and counter-subjects, his modulations and progressions, and they leave barely a trace behind of any melodic idea, or any tangible musical thought. The concerto has four movements and episodes diversify some of them, but not one maintains or imparts any alluring or compelling mood. Miss Goodson played the piano part as one who would persuade her hearers to believe in it as she believes in it herself, to find in it what she tries to find. Dr. Muck and the orchestra seconded her to the full. They indeed brought sometimes a semblance of musical and emotional life into what, less sympathetically handled, might have seemed dry bones. Mr. Hinton could hardly complain of the performance. Rather, it was for the audience, recalling Miss Goodson in Grieg's concerto, last year, to complain of the music in which she had returned.

H. T. P.

[illegible] E, MA
MAR 5- 1908

Dr. Karl Muck's Successor.

Boston, Mass., March 4.—It was announced tonight by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

GLOBE—MARCH 8

MUSICAL MATTERS

Longest of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Converse, MacDowell and Hinton Represented.

Grand Opera Promises—Current Events.

Dr Muck's Anglo-American Symphony program, the 17th of the season, was of generous proportions, nearly two and one-quarter hours being required for playing the "Jeanne d'Arc" scenes by Frederick S. Converse, Arthur Hinton's D minor concerto for piano and orchestra and Edward MacDowell's "Indian" orchestral suite. Mme Katharine Goodson played the piano part in the Hinton concerto, which represented the English division of the program. This and the Converse work were given for the first times at these concerts.

Mr Converse originally wrote the "Jeanne d'Arc" music for the drama produced by Miss Marlowe and Mr Sothern in 1906 and subsequently the composer revised his work and amplified it for a large orchestra. Since it was performed in Jordan hall about a year ago further changes have been made in portions of the score, but the fundamental structure remains the same, and its idylic tone pictures suggesting incidents in the life of the French girl heroine and martyr are again welcome, and especially so when shown in vivid and effective contrasts, which was the case under Dr Muck's direction.

The five divisions are admirably varied. In the first the hint at battles to come is skilfully woven into the gentler measures representing peace, the latter idea being developed in pastoral form in the succeeding part. The vigor of the battle hymn and tumult and din of battle are splendidly set forth in the instrumentation of the third movement; the mystery and confusion in the "Night Vision" is typically weird and suggestive of the scene where Jeanne is sleeping in the woods and visions flit across her weary brain.

In the "resume" in the finale Mr Con[illegible] handles skilfully former material in new combinations, working up a grand climax just before the exquisite melody at the close which is in the nature of an apotheosis. The work is one of great merit, and although modern and very effective is not abstruse and overburdened with dissonants and cross-harmonies to produce effects. The former commendation of the "scenes" holds good now, and the orchestral work brought out in new light their many fine passages.

Mme Goodson, as soloist in the Hinton piano concerto, gave a brilliant exhibition of her attainments, in which the velocity of finger work under various conditions was dazzling; and the facility of technique did not impair the limpidity of playing in pianissimo, which is frequently the case. And in chord passages in fortissimo she was in most instances able to hold her own with the orchestra.

The concerto, which was written by her husband, shows Mme Goodson's abilities to excellent advantage; but she has already proved herself an artist of exceptional power and a general encomium for her performance as a whole really is praise enough at this time. The beauty of her crisp, delicate and sparkling pianissimo in the second movement will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it, and the energy and verve of the last movement was nearly as effective, when association with the orchestra is considered. The artist was rapturously applauded and called back several times.

The "Indian" suite by MacDowell is familiar, but a repetition of this sterling work again shows its worth as a contribution to musical literature. Conceived in a broad and patriotic spirit, the lamented composer worked out ideals according to his own high standard, and illustrated his pictures in a musical form, full of poetic characteristics.

All in all, the orchestra was more satisfactory in interpreting this work than in the other two. The quaint and typical "Indian" motifs, the "love song," which gave the wood winds their chances; the roughly strenuous war-time dances, which gave all the intonements something to do, and the "Dirge" were each made interesting, and held the auditors despite the length of the program. And the jollity of the "Village Festival" was indisputably in evidence, so gayly was it rushed through.

For the first time the name of Balakireff, one of the leading Russian composers, will appear on a Boston Symphony program this week. He will be represented by his symphony in C minor, the one work of the kind he has written. It was played for the first time in this country by the Chicago orchestra in January, 1907, and was announced for performance by the Russian society in New York, but for some reason was not given.

Mr Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," which had such a success at the symphony concerts earlier in the season, will be repeated, with Mr Gebhard as pianist. The final number on the program will be Chabrier's overture "Gwendoline."

concert master at the Bayreuth festival. The nerves of his left arm have troubled him of late. As The Herald stated some days ago, Mr. Czerwonky, the second concert master, will leave at the end of this season to pursue the career of a virtuoso. The two successors will not be chosen probably until late in the sprnig.

[160]

HERALD—BOSTON, MARCH 8

'JEANNE D'ARC' AT SYMPHONY HALL

Converse's Suite of Dramatic Scenes Given at 17th Concert.

ORCHESTRA EXCELLED IN MacDOWELL'S 'DIRGE'

Many Considered His 'Indian' Suite a Touching Memorial Service.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes...Converse
Concerto for piano.....Hinton
"Indian" Suite.....MacDowell

Mr. Converse's suite is taken from the music to Percy Mackaye's drama, which was produced in Philadelphia and played here a little over a year ago at the Boston Theatre, with Julia Marlowe as the Maid of Orleans. Mr. Sothern at the time was anxious that his plays should have appropriate music, and he provided an orchestra of respectable size, for a playhouse, and a competent conductor. Unfortunately he did not reckon on the indifference of the audience.

In Boston the entr'actes were heard with difficulty by those who were interested in Mr. Converse and his work. Some men left their seats, presumably in search of fresh air, and returned smelling of fireworks. Others entertained the women in their charge by finding fault with the drama and by diverting gossip. There was much coughing. The music was lost in the din. Soon after this performance the suite was played at an orchestral concert, led by Mr. Goodrich, in Jordan Hall, and it then made a pleasing impression, as descriptive or suggestive music without any inevitable association with the play that called it into being. The performance last night confirmed this impression.

Mr. Converse has not attempted to compose a symphonic poem in five movements, a work laid out on broad lines. He has not endeavored to explain in music the singular theory of Dr. Icard concerning the cause of Jeanne's hallucinations, nor do his scenes purport to be deeply psychological. He wrote music for a drama and with the playhouse in view. His music should be taken in the spirit in which it was composed.

Let it be granted at once that the "Battle Hymn" is purely theatrical and without marked significance for concert purposes, and that as a concert piece the interest of the finale is not sustained from the beginning to the end. Yet in this very finale there are beautiful pages and the ending has genuine pathos.

The other movements, "In Domremy," "Pastoral Reverie" and "Night Visions," have excellent qualities. The melodic lines are clear, flowing and individual. There is a sense of dramatic contrast and a marked richness of orchestral color; above all there is the successful expression of a sympathy with a heroine, a sympathy that is not allowed to become either weakly sentimental or bombastically heroic; in a word there is the expression that comes from the exercise of the imaginative faculty.

Nor is it necessary to know the text of the drama in order to share the various moods of the composer. Furthermore, in his expression of thought Mr. Converse is here freer and more spontaneously poetic both in lyric flight and in poignant suggestion than in some of his more important and preceding works. The overture would be a more complete and rounded whole if the last few measures were omitted. They are not only superfluous; they change, and without effect, the mood and line of thought which a sensitive hearer feels should bring the logical, inevitable conclusion.

There are charming orchestral pictures throughout the work. The blending of timbres and the succession of timbres are often arranged with uncommon skill; this is to be observed especially in the "Pastoral Reverie." It should also be remarked that although Mr. Converse employs a very large orchestra, some of his most striking effects are gained by apparently simple means; by an exquisite sense of the value of tints and demi-tints in his orchestral painting.

Mr. Hinton's concerto was played in Boston for the first time. When it was played at the last Worcester festival by Mme. Katharine Goodson, the composer's wife and the pianist of last evening, the piece seemed well suited to the virtuoso's purposes. Last night the concerto seemed on the whole laboriously constructed, without real melodic charm; music that is not a lucid expression of the composer's intentions, however honorable they may have been; music that suggested manufacture by contract labor. Mme. Goodson played with nervous energy and brilliance of mechanism, and displayed a spirit of wifely devotion.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a most eloquent interpretation of the "Dirge" in MacDowell's "Indian" suite. The "Dirge" itself is the crowning glory of a highly original and engrossing work. This lamentation might be that of the dying race. There is nothing of the luxury of woe; there is no conventional music for "threadbare crape and tears." There is the dignity of man who has been familiar with nature, who has known the voices of the day and of the night on lonely prairie and in sombre forest. There is serene yielding to fate.

To many in the audience this performance was the most touching of memorial services in honor of the dead composer.

"Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
And burned is Apollo's laurel bough."

MUSIC NOTES.

Mr. Wendling, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will return to Stuttgart at the end of the season and will not come back. His decision, regretted by many, rests exclusively on family reasons. If he is in good physical condition next summer he will fill his old position as

UNUSUAL INCIDENTS MARK SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Hands-Across-the-Sea" Program, Directed by Eminent German Conductor—Glockenspiel Adds Its Harmony.

Unusual incidents and arrangements made the Symphony concert of Saturday night memorable. In the first place the program was entirely English-American—the "Jeanne d'Arc" music of F. S. Converse, who, though a native of Newton and a resident of Westwood, is classed among the Boston composers; the concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, written by Arthur Hinton of London, and MacDowell's "Indian" suite, written when the lamented composer was living in Boston, and dedicated to the Symphony Orchestra and its conductor at that time, Emil Paur. Two of the composers honored with places on the program were present at the concert—Mr. Converse and Mr. Hinton. However, neither one of them made his presence generally known by acknowledgment of applause. There was a long call for Mr. Converse, but he held his seat firmly and modestly. Dr. Muck responded until he got suspicious of the intent of the applause and shrugged his shoulders as if to inquire what it was all about.

Tribute to Dead Composer.

As for the third composer, MacDowell, this was the first time one of his works appeared on a Symphony program since his death late in January. The dirge—the fourth movement—made it seem particularly appropriate. And possibly on account of the memorial nature of the number the audience, with the exception of a few, remained seated until the number, which was the last on the program, had been entirely performed.

Only those who have ever witnessed the customary 9.55 rush can appreciate the deep significance of this tribute to the composer.

The soloist of the evening, Mme. Katharine Goodson, in private life is Mrs. Arthur Hinton. Hence on this occasion she played her husband's music. Here was still more emphasis upon the Anglo-Saxon nature of the attractions. And to think that this hand-across-the-sea or blood-is-thicker-than-water occasion should have been presided over by a distinguished visitor from Berlin. However, Dr. Muck is patient and catholic, full of spirit and sympathy. He did his best to make the concert entertaining and stimulating, but failed. The conductor was willing, but the music was weak.

Glockenspiel on the Stage.

Finally, the audience was confronted by something on the stage that looked like—well, some said it was a fancy parlor organ and others thought it might be a new-fangled console for the big organ at the back of the stage. As a matter of fact it was a glockenspiel or carillon, an arrangement of bells or bars played at a keyboard. The player was one of the members of the orchestra, who sat hidden behind the curio; and the instrument was used in the Converse piece. It made very sweet and tinkly music indeed. And back in the southwest corner of the stage was a set of heavy chimes used in the pageant scene in the Jeanne d'Arc music.

The program of this week's concert embraces a symphony by Balakireff, to be played for the first time; Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, and a repetition of Loeffler's "Paran Poem."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAR.

NEWARK, N.J.

MAR 8- 1908

Max Fiedler, who holds a high place among the conductors of Germany, has been secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, as conductor. Mr. Fiedler is 49 years old and has devoted his whole life to music. Before he became a conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany. His first lessons were taken from his father, Karl August Fiedler, in Zittau, and he later studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a student at Leipsic and two years later he became one of the faculty in the Hamburg Conservatory. In 1903 he became its director.

DISPATCH.

COLUMBUS, O.

MAR 8- 1908

[illegible] Symphony hall (Bos- [illegible] on the occasion of [illegible] Orchestra Pen- [illegible] day eve- [illegible] nished by [illegible] Madame [illegible] kindly vol- [illegible] so of [illegible]

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Converse—Dramatic Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc."
Hinton—Piano concerto in D minor.
Pianist, Mme. Katharine Goodson.
MacDowell—"Indian Suite."

An American and English programme! For once Germany and Russia and France were put upon the shelf and the Anglo-Saxons ruled. Yet the programme was indigestible in spots.

Converse's Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc" sustained the good impression we had formed of it when heard under Mr. Wallace Goodrich's leadership in Jordan Hall. It might be shorter and the finale might be less vague, but there is a firm grasp of the subject, an absolute mastery of the orchestra, and good poetic instinct in the work. The genius of Mr. Converse is more orchestral than vocal. His "Job" is to be given in Hamburg shortly, but we wish that Germany might make his acquaintance through his less severe and more romantic orchestral music.

The opening movement of his "Scenes" (they are more ambitious than a "Suite") "In Domremy," is to our mind, one of the finest movements in American orchestral music. Its suggestion of village chimes, its rustic second theme, its development of a simple two-noted, Iambic, figure, its strong contrasts, its brilliant end (its piccolo phrases suggest the end of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture) all these points combine to make a very dignified and interesting movement.

The succeeding Pastorale introduces some effective English horn playing, which was excellently executed. The "Night Vision" began like a beautiful "Waldesweben," a moonlight picture that might compare with Schumann's graphicality in this direction. In this the unusual Celesta, a set of bell-chimes combined with wooden sounding-boards, and infinitely sweeter than the Glockenspiel, was used very effectively.

The finale, as already intimated, we do not find so powerful as other parts of the work. This ingenious summing up was scarcely necessary. It would have been better to have ended with the battle-scene, which would make a glorious climax. This combative movement is one of the finest parts of the work. It is full of what Shakespeare would mark—"Alarums and excursions," but it is intelligible in the midst of its fury. It is far more coherent than the rough and tumble fight which Strauss has given in his "Heldenleben." The working up of the grand old mediaeval hymn forms a noble end to the movement and would, musically if not historically, make an effective conclusion to a set of movements.

The new concerto by Mr. Arthur Hinton, although effective in its finale, is a somewhat labored work. It gave very few points of melodic ease; the attention of the auditor was strenuously claimed in every measure. The development of a four-noted kettle-drum figure was not quite so easy to follow as the treatment of a somewhat similar idea by Beethoven in his violin concerto. All through the first movement matters were turgid and not easily grasped. But the second movement was more graceful and dainty with its idealization of a waltz-rhythm and its piquant contrasts.

The Andante was in the nature of a long introduction to the finale. It was in a preluding and improvisational vein, although, as in every part of the work, there was some ingenuity of figure treatment. This thematic development (especially in the first movement) proved Mr. Hinton an able musician, a skilful composer, but he should not allow his learning to obscure the melodic and romantic side.

The finale had some fiery and brilliant treatment. There was a martial and triumphant vein in one of its themes, there was a fine working up to a climax, and there was an exciting stretto and coda. It is, we think, the first movement that over-weights this concerto, for the second and last movements have many points of beauty.

Mme. Goodson played the work like a consummate artist. Happy the composer who has her as his interpreter. Every point of the work was given with loving care, such as Clara Schumann used to bestow upon the piano works of her great husband. The delicacy of the second movement, the pensive character of the Andante and the tremendous energy of the finale were all excellently given. The bravura of the end was incomparably fine. The audience responded heartily to this climax and recalled Mme. Goodson three times.

Then came MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Dr. Muck did not conduct this with a tomahawk and the orchestra refrained from war-whoops. The work scarcely made as great an impression on the reviewer as when it was given by Emil Paur. The Dirge was drawn out to such a slow tempo that it nearly fell apart (possibly a "Grave" movement fits best to a Dirge), and the galloping off of the warriors in the third movement could have been made more graphic.

We dislike to see the marks of expression in the English language as MacDowell has used them. The present writer (in his Dictionary of Music) has stated the case as follows:—

"Although Schumann and Wagner use German terms in their works, and Berlioz and the Cesar Franck school, French, Italian is the preferable tongue for musical terms, for the following reasons: 1st. It has priority. It was the first language used in this field, and has been in almost universal use for three centuries. 2d. It is impossible to allow each composer the use of his native language. If Liszt had used Hungarian, Tchaikowsky Russian, Dvorak Bohemian, Grieg Norwegian, etc., we should find many more difficulties in the matter than in the use of a single language. 3d. Musical notation is a single, universal, written language. Such a language requires an equally universal set of tempo or expression-marks. Exactly as in affairs of state, diplomats have chosen the French language as the universal tongue, music has chosen Italian as her language of tempo and expression-marks; and we urge upon every composer to further this unity by discarding English, French, or German markings, and using Italian only."

Nor is the use of real Indian themes in this work of any great importance. The Indian songs were too local, too tribal, to become really national folk-music in any true sense of the word [illegible] did not [illegible] matter [illegible]

[illegible] they were MacDowellesque. One could give a great composer a theme from a pupil's finger-exercise and he would be able to make something musical out of it by thematic treatment, as the French cook was able to make a palatable dish out of an old glove.

The Indians in this Suite are inclined to Wagnerism and are ready to discharge muted horns and clarinettes on the slightest provocation.

The beauties of the work need no restatement. It is a poetic and impressive picture, and in Europe it is likely to arouse especial interest as ethnological music. But after repeated hearings we do not rank it quite as great as some of MacDowell's other orchestral composition, although it is always worthy of a high place in the native repertoire.

Louis C. Elson.

MES,

New York City.

MAR 8- 1908

It is an unhappy thought that a successor to Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be provided after the end of this season. But, as has been announced, he cannot prolong his absence from the Royal Opera in Berlin longer than this second year, to which the Emperor was led to assent only after urgent representations from influential quarters. "Great and good friends" are said to have exchanged protocols on this subject, and the Germanic Museum at Harvard is not the only evidence of a desire to extend tangible proofs of friendship and to oblige. In whatever way it came about Dr. Muck's activity of two years at the head of the Boston Orchestra has been a most stirring and delightful experience for the music-lovers not only of Boston but also of all the cities reached by the orchestra's influence. He has shown himself to be a conductor of the first order, and few things finer than his best achievements have been heard here.

The telegraph reports that the authorities of the orchestra have finally engaged as Dr. Muck's successor Max Fiedler, now conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown to New York. He was one of the New York Philharmonic Society's "guest conductors" who came from Europe to direct their concerts in their period of interregnum. He conducted the third public rehearsal and concert of the society in the season of 1905-6, on Dec. 15 and 16, 1905. He made at that time a highly satisfactory impression. The Times spoke of him thus after the concert:

Max Fiedler has a substantial reputation in Europe, but it has not been widely extended in this country. Mr. Fiedler, indeed, has none of the attributes of the "virtuoso conductor" in the less desirable sense. But his performance with the orchestra yesterday showed him to be a highly accomplished director, of remarkable skill, routine, overflowing vitality, and imperious authority. He is evidently something of a martinet, and the qualities of a martinet are what the Philharmonic Society needs at all times, in addition to all the others that go to make a conductor who can interpret great music in a way to hold the attention of such an audience as the Philharmonic's.

Mr. Fiedler has much more, but he obtained, first of all, a performance of excellent ensemble, precision, and brilliancy such as few of the men who have preceded him with greater reputations have surpassed. * * * He is not a poet, either in appearance or in manner, nor does he see visions of the unattainable things. He is not a revolutionary, and is not bent on finding what none have found before him in the music he plays. Still less is he concerned with the exploitation of himself. Mr. Fiedler's demonstrations are all for the benefit of the orchestra, and not at all for the audience. They are unmistakable and decisive, and they have their results.

In Beethoven's Fifth Symphony "all was sane, wholesome, and well ordered." The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was "most broadly read and played with splendid vigor, and while Mr. Fiedler took the tempi with elasticity, he found occasion for nothing that disturbed well-known and well-beloved conceptions of the music."

Mr. Fiedler has won honors outside of his own country and New York, for besides his one pair of concerts here he has conducted with success in Paris and Madrid, and for several years conducted a series of concerts in St. Petersburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. From 1877 to 1880 he was a student at the Leipzig Conservatory, where he distinguished himself as a pianist. He was then engaged as instructor at the Hamburg Conservatory, of which he is now artistic director. His first essays as a conductor were made in 1894. Mr. Fiedler also has a name as a composer, having written a symphony, a piano quintet, a string quartet, and several songs and piano pieces.

[illegible] ARD ALDRICH.

POST

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 4- 1908

Boston Symphony Director.

Boston, Mass., Mar. 4.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mrs. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

om GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

dress New York City.

ate MAR 7- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY NOTES.

IN addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concertmaster and a new second concertmaster in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concertmaster in Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to go was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the orchestra might retain his services. He expects next summer to be concertmaster at the Wagner festival at Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

Mme Melba has sailed from Australia and is returning to Europe after an absence of nearly nine months. She plans to be in Paris by March 25, and will stay in that city for some weeks. Thence she will go to London, where, as usual, she will be the principal lyric soprano in the season of grand opera at Covent Garden. Mme Melba is reported to be in the best of health as a result of her long rest. She gave some concerts in Australia with great success. Her plans for next season are not settled, and it is not assured whether she will return to America then.

Mr. Paderewski finished his series of concerts along the Pacific coast in the first week of March, and has now turned eastward, and will gradually work his way back to New York, from which city he expects to sail in the first week of May. He will give one concert in New Mexico and three in Texas. His only concerts in the south will be in Little Rock, Memphis, Atlanta, and Nashville. With the concerts he has given and those scheduled he will have played at the end of his season ninety-four times, but it is likely that his manager, C. A. Ellis, will put in some more dates for the month of April in order to satisfy the demand for him.

EVENING WORLD,

ss New York City.

The next two New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will mark the farewell of Dr. Karl Muck. Emperor William has refused to extend his leave of absence from Berlin any further. He will be sorely missed. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been chosen to succeed him in the leadership of the Boston band. Mr. Fiedler is little known outside of Germany, but he conducted two concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society in 1905 and made a good impression.

EVENING SUN,

n New York City.

ress

e MAR 7- 1908

From the Boston Orchestra comes news to-day that both Wendling and Czerwonky, the two "first violins," will retire this year.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

MAR 8- 1908

In the fifteen symphony programmes that have been played in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year Dr. Muck has presented a total number of eighteen works which are new to Boston, and a majority of them have had their first hearing in America.

In the next four concerts he will present Dohnanyi's concert piece for orchestra, with 'cello obligato; Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra; Hinton's concerto for piano; Beethoven's symphony in C major; Debussy's "Nocturnes," suite for orchestra, and two pieces for orchestra, [illegible] for Gustav Strube's [illegible] and Loeffler's "A Pagan [illegible]

...MONDAY,
MARCH 9, 1908.

UNUSUAL INCIDENTS MARK SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Hands-Across-the-Sea" Program, Directed by Eminent German Conductor—Glockenspiel Adds Its Harmony.

Unusual incidents and arrangements made the Symphony concert of Saturday night memorable. In the first place the program was entirely English-American—the "Jeanne d'Arc" music of F. S. Converse, who, though a native of Newton and a resident of Westwood, is classed among the Boston composers; the concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, written by Arthur Hinton of London, and MacDowell's "Indian" suite, written when the lamented composer was living in Boston, and dedicated to the Symphony Orchestra and its conductor at that time, Emil Paur.

Two of the composers honored with places on the program were present at the concert—Mr. Converse and Mr. Hinton. However, neither one of them made his presence generally known by acknowledgment of applause. There was a long call for Mr. Converse, but he held his seat firmly and modestly. Dr. Muck responded until he got suspicious of the intent of the applause and shrugged his shoulders as if to inquire what it was all about.

Tribute to Dead Composer.

As for the third composer, MacDowell, this was the first time one of his works appeared on a Symphony program since his death late in January. The dirge—the fourth movement—made it seem particularly appropriate. And possibly on account of the memorial nature of the number the audience, with the exception of a few, remained seated until the number, which was the last on the program, had been entirely performed.

Only those who have ever witnessed the customary 9.55 rush can appreciate the deep significance of this tribute to the composer.

The soloist of the evening, Mme. Katharine Goodson, in private life is Mrs. Arthur Hinton. Hence on this occasion she played her husband's music. Here was still more emphasis upon the Anglo-Saxon nature of the attractions. And to think that this hand-across-the-sea or blood-is-thicker-than-water occasion should have been presided over by a distinguished visitor from Berlin. However, Dr. Muck is patient and catholic, full of spirit and sympathy. He did his best to make the concert entertaining and stimulating, but failed. The conductor was willing, but the music was weak.

Glockenspiel on the Stage.

Finally, the audience was confronted by something on the stage that looked like—well, some said it was a fancy parlor organ and others thought it might be a new-fangled console for the big organ at the back of the stage. As a matter of fact it was a glockenspiel or carillon, an arrangement of bells or bars played at a keyboard. The player was one of the members of the orchestra, who sat hidden behind the curio; and the instrument was used in the Converse piece. It made very sweet and tinkly music indeed. And back in the southwest corner of the stage was a set of heavy chimes used in the pageant scene in the Jeanne d'Arc music.

The program of this week's concert embraces a symphony by Balakireff, to be played for the first time; Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, and a repetition of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...

...ess ...

...

Max Fiedler, who holds a high place among the conductors of Germany, has been secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, as conductor. Mr. Fiedler is 49 years old and has devoted his whole life to music. Before he became a conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany. His first lessons were taken from his father, Karl August Fiedler, in Zittau, and he later studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a student at Leipsic and two years later he became one of the faculty in the Hamburg Conservatory. In 1903 he became its director.

...

Every seat in Symphony hall (Boston) was occupied on the occasion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert last Sunday evening. The program was furnished by the superb orchestra and Madame Schumann Heink, who had kindly volunteered her services for the sake of ... and was made up of Wag... ... enthusiasm demon... ... showing tremend... ... great artist...

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Converse—Dramatic Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc."
Hinton—Piano concerto in D minor.
Pianist, Mme. Katharine Goodson.
MacDowell—"Indian Suite."

An American and English programme! For once Germany and Russia and France were put upon the shelf and the Anglo-Saxons ruled. Yet the programme was indigestible in spots.

Converse's Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc" sustained the good impression we had formed of it when heard under Mr. Wallace Goodrich's leadership, in Jordan Hall. It might be shorter and the finale might be less vague, but there is a firm grasp of the subject, an absolute mastery of the orchestra, and good poetic instinct in the work. The genius of Mr. Converse is more orchestral than vocal. His "Job" is to be given in Hamburg shortly, but we wish that Germany might make his acquaintance through his less severe and more romantic orchestral music.

The opening movement of his "Scenes" (they are more ambitious than a "Suite") "In Domremy," is to our mind, one of the finest movements in American orchestral music. Its suggestion of village chimes, its rustic second theme, its development of a simple two-noted, Iambic, figure, its strong contrasts, its brilliant end (its piccolo phrases suggest the end of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture) all these points combine to make a very dignified and interesting movement.

The succeeding Pastorale introduces some effective English horn playing, which was excellently executed. The "Night Vision" began like a beautiful "Waldesweben," a moonlight picture that might compare with Schumann's graphicality in this direction. In this the unusual Celesta, a set of bell-chimes combined with wooden sounding-boards, and infinitely sweeter than the Glockenspiel, was used very effectively.

The finale, as already intimated, we do not find so powerful as other parts of the work. This ingenious summing up was scarcely necessary. It would have been better to have ended with the battle-scene, which would make a glorious climax. This combative movement is one of the finest parts of the work. It is full of what Shakespeare would mark—"Alarums and excursions," but it is intelligible in the midst of its fury. It is far more coherent than the rough and tumble fight which Strauss has given in his "Heldenleben." The working up of the grand old mediaeval hymn forms a noble end to the movement and would, musically if not historically, make an effective conclusion to a set of movements.

The new concerto by Mr. Arthur Hinton, although effective in its finale, is a somewhat labored work. It gave very few points of melodic ease; the attention of the auditor was strenuously claimed in every measure. The development of a four-noted kettle-drum figure was not quite so easy to follow as the treatment of a somewhat similar idea by Beethoven in his violin concerto. All through the first movement matters were turgid and not easily grasped. But the second movement was more graceful and dainty with its idealization of a waltz-rhythm and its piquant contrasts.

The Andante was in the nature of a long introduction to the finale. It was in a preluding and improvisational vein, although, as in every part of the work, there was some ingenuity of figure treatment. This thematic development (especially in the first movement) proved Mr. Hinton an able musician, a skilful composer, but he should not allow his learning to obscure the melodic and romantic side.

The finale had some fiery and brilliant treatment. There was a martial and triumphant vein in one of its themes, there was a fine working up to a climax, and there was an exciting stretto and coda. It is, we think, the first movement that over-weights this concerto, for the second and last movements have many points of beauty.

Mme. Goodson played the work like a consummate artist. Happy the composer who has her as his interpreter. Every point of the work was given with loving care, such as Clara Schumann used to bestow upon the piano works of her great husband. The delicacy of the second movement, the pensive character of the Andante and the tremendous energy of the finale were all excellently given. The bravura of the end was incomparably fine. The audience responded heartily to this climax and recalled Mme. Goodson three times.

Then came MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Dr. Muck did not conduct this with a tomahawk and the orchestra refrained from war-whoops. The work scarcely made as great an impression on the reviewer as when it was given by Emil Paur. The Dirge was drawn out to such a slow tempo that it nearly fell apart (possibly a "Grave" movement fits best to a Dirge), and the galloping off of the warriors in the third movement could have been made more graphic.

We dislike to see the marks of expression in the English language, as MacDowell has used them. The present writer (in his Dictionary of Music) has stated the case as follows:—

"Although Schumann and Wagner use German terms in their works, and Berlioz and the Cesar Franck school, French, Italian is the preferable tongue for musical terms, for the following reasons: 1st. It has priority. It was the first language used in this field, and has been in almost universal use for three centuries. 2d. It is impossible to allow each composer the use of his native language. If Liszt had used Hungarian, Tchaikowsky Russian, Dvorak Bohemian, Grieg Norwegian, etc., we should find many more difficulties in the matter than in the use of a single language. 3d. Musical notation is a single, universal, written language. Such a language requires an equally universal set of tempo or expression-marks. Exactly as in affairs of state, diplomats have chosen the French language as the universal tongue, music has chosen Italian as her language of tempo and expression-marks; and we urge upon every composer to further this unity by discarding English, French, or German markings, and using Italian only."

Nor is the use of real Indian themes in this work of any great importance. The Indian songs were too local, too tribal, to become really national folk-music in any true sense of the word. Of course it did not, much matter, whether the themes came from, for they were MacDowellized. One could give a great composer a theme from a pupil's finger-exercise and he would be able to make something musical out of it by thematic treatment, as the French cook was able to make a palatable dish out of an old glove.

The Indians in this Suite are inclined to Wagnerism and are ready to discharge muted horns and clarinettes on the slightest provocation.

The beauties of the work need no restatement. It is a poetic and impressive picture, and in Europe it is likely to arouse especial interest as ethnological music. But after repeated hearings we do not rank it quite as great as some of MacDowell's other orchestral composition, although it is always worthy of a high place in the native repertoire.

Louis C. Elson.

...MES,

New York City.

MAR 8 - 1908

It is an unhappy thought that a successor to Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be provided after the end of this season. But, as has been announced, he cannot prolong his absence from the Royal Opera in Berlin longer than this second year, to which the Emperor was led to assent only after urgent representations from influential quarters. "Great and good friends" are said to have exchanged protocols on this subject, and the Germanic Museum at Harvard is not the only evidence of a desire to extend tangible proofs of friendship and to oblige. In whatever way it came about Dr. Muck's activity of two years at the head of the Boston Orchestra has been a most stirring and delightful experience for the music-lovers not only of Boston but also of all the cities reached by the orchestra's influence. He has shown himself to be a conductor of the first order, and few things finer than his best achievements have been heard here.

The telegraph reports that the authorities of the orchestra have finally engaged as Dr. Muck's successor Max Fiedler, now conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown to New York. He was one of the New York Philharmonic Society's "guest conductors" who came from Europe to direct their concerts in their period of interregnum. He conducted the third public rehearsal and concert of the society in the season of 1905-6, on Dec. 15 and 16, 1905. He made at that time a highly satisfactory impression. THE TIMES spoke of him thus after the concert:

Max Fiedler has a substantial reputation in Europe, but it has not been widely extended in this country. Mr. Fiedler, indeed, has none of the attributes of the "virtuoso conductor" in the less desirable sense. But his performance with the orchestra yesterday showed him to be a highly accomplished director, of remarkable skill, routine, overflowing vitality, and imperious authority. He is evidently something of a martinet, and the qualities of a martinet are what the Philharmonic Society needs at all times, in addition to all the others that go to make a conductor who can interpret great music in a way to hold the attention of such an audience as the Philharmonic's.

Mr. Fiedler has much more, but he obtained, first of all, a performance of excellent ensemble, precision, and brilliancy such as few of the men who have preceded him with greater reputations have surpassed. * * * He is not a poet, either in appearance or in manner, nor does he see visions of the unattainable things. He is not a revolutionary, and is not bent on finding what none have found before him in the music he plays. Still less is he concerned with the exploitation of himself. Mr. Fiedler's demonstrations are all for the benefit of the orchestra, and not at all for the audience. They are unmistakable and decisive, and they have their results.

In Beethoven's Fifth Symphony "all was sane, wholesome, and well ordered." The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was "most broadly read and played with splendid vigor, and while Mr. Fiedler took the tempi with elasticity, he found occasion for nothing that disturbed well-known and well-beloved conceptions of the music."

Mr. Fiedler has won honors outside of his own country and New York, for besides his one pair of concerts here he has conducted with success in Paris and Madrid, and for several years conducted a series of concerts in St. Petersburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. From 1877 to 1880 he was a student at the Leipzig Conservatory, where he distinguished himself as a pianist. He was then engaged as instructor at the Hamburg Conservatory, of which he is now artistic director. His first essays as a conductor were made in 1894. Mr. Fiedler also has a name as a composer, having written a symphony, a piano quintet, a string quartet, and several songs and piano pieces.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

[161]

...

Boston Symphony Director.

Boston, Mass., Mar. 4.—It was announced to-night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mrs. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

...om ... GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

...dress ... New York City.

...te ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY NOTES.

IN addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concertmaster and a new second concertmaster in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concertmaster in Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to go was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the orchestra might retain his services. He expects next summer to be concertmaster at the Wagner festival at Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

Mme Melba has sailed from Australia and is returning to Europe after an absence of nearly nine months. She plans to be in Paris by March 25, and will stay in that city for some weeks. Thence she will go to London, where, as usual, she will be the principal lyric soprano in the season of grand opera at Covent Garden. Mme Melba is reported to be in the best of health as a result of her long rest. She gave some concerts in Australia with great success. He plans for next season are not settled, and it is not assured whether she will return to America then.

Mr. Paderewski finished his series of concerts along the Pacific coast in the first week of March, and has now turned eastward, and will gradually work his way back to New York, from which city he expects to sail in the first week of May. He will give one concert in New Mexico and three in Texas. His only concerts in the south will be in Little Rock, Memphis, Atlanta, and Nashville. With the concerts he has given and those scheduled he will have played at the end of his season ninety-four times, but it is likely that his manager, C. A. Ellis, will put in some more dates for the month of April in order to satisfy the demand for him.

EVENING WORLD,

...ss ... New York City.

The next two New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will mark the farewell of Dr. Karl Muck. Emperor William has refused to extend his leave of absence from Berlin any further. He will be sorely missed. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been chosen to succeed him in the leadership of the Boston band. Mr. Fiedler is little known outside of Germany, but he conducted two concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society in 1905 and made a good impression.

EVENING SUN,

...n ... New York City.

...ress ...

...e ...

From the Boston Orchestra comes news to-day that both Wendling and Czerwonky, the two "first violins," will retire this year.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

... New York City.

...s ...

In the fifteen symphony programmes that have been played in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year Dr. Muck has presented a total number of eighteen works which are new to Boston, and a majority of them have had their first hearing in America.

In the next four concerts he will present Dohnanyi's concert piece for orchestra, with 'cello obligato; Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra; Hinton's concerto for piano; Rabikoff's symphony in C major; Halvorsen's "Kossegrimen," suite for orchestra; and two pieces for orchestra, with viola obligato, by Gustav Strube. The Bischoff symphony and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" are both repeated.

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
Date MAR 8- 1908

MAX FIEDLER.
...w conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who has been engaged to succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not wholly a stranger to the patrons of orchestral concerts in New York. He was one of the foreign conductors brought hither by the Philharmonic Society to conduct one of its concerts three seasons ago. On December 15 and 16, 1905, he conducted two concerts, at which the programme consisted of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, this number, together with the scene and air "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio," having been placed upon the programme in recognition of the anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Fiedler made a fine impression, and was applauded with great enthusiasm at both concerts. The opinion of The Tribune's reviewer was then set down:

A masterful, a wise, a keenly analytical, a lucid and inspiriting conductor is Mr. Fiedler. His technical methods are admirably intelligible, his devotion to the work in hand is complete. A finer performance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" can scarcely be imagined. It was splendidly illuminative of the elements which Wagner's comedy presents in conflict—the square toed rule of thumb march melodies of the pedantic guildmen, the eager, pulsating, passionate melodies of the lovers standing as the representatives of romanticism. The characterization was vivid, and the piece throbbed with vitality. In the symphony there was no striving for effects not justified by the printed page. His tempi in the first and last movements were more animated than those to which we are accustomed. Whether or not this was a blemish is largely a matter of taste. They were consistently carried out and did not spoil the symmetry of the picture. Altogether it was as notable an accomplishment as any which we have had to record since the Philharmonic Society adopted its present policy.

Mr. Fiedler comes from Hamburg and, we believe, has an American wife. He has conducted symphony concerts in Paris, St. Petersburg and Madrid, and enjoys an enviable reputation in his native Germany. He was born in Zittau on December 31, 1859, where he made his first studies with his father. Subsequently he studied at the Leipzig Conservatorium (1877-'80), where he won the Holstein scholarship. He became a member of the faculty of the Hamburg Conservatory in 1882, and has been conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic concerts for the last seven or eight years. He has made dignified essays in the field of composition.

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
MAR 8- 1908

"California, Her Mountains and Valleys," will be the topic of the next illustrated lecture which Frederick Monsen will deliver under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences at Association Hall on Saturday afternoon and evening. Mr. Monsen will complete the series on March 21 with a lecture on Arizona. On March 12 the Kneisel String Quartet will give a chamber music concert at Association Hall in the evening. On the evening of Friday, March 20, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth and last concert of the season at the Baptist Temple. On March 28 Garrett P. Serviss will give the first of his course of four illustrated lectures at Association Hall. The course will include afternoon as well as evening talks. The topics will be "The Alps," "Spain," "Venice" and "Rome." On March 30 Leslie Harris, known as England's greatest entertainer, will appear in the evening at Association Hall. His programme will consist of humorous and musical "sketches." Jan Kubelik will play in the Baptist Temple on the evening of March 19. It will be his second violin recital in the borough. Kubelik will be assisted by Mlle. Berthe Roy, pianist. Herr Ludwig Schwab will act as accompanist.

...NORTH AMERICAN
...PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 8- 1908

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March ...

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
MAR 9 - 1908

SONGS AND SINGERS.

It is disappointing news that so great a conductor as Dr. Muck is to be succeeded by a man of Max Fiedler's lesser attainments. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new musical director is, we are informed, a warm personal friend of Muck. It was Muck, indeed, who recommended him to the powers that be. Friendship, however, is no mark of merit. History is full of examples of the greater stepping into the arena for the lesser. Fiedler surely will not replace Muck in the affection of Boston and New York audiences, and should Muck return to his present post after an interim of Fiedler it is probable he will be welcomed with open arms.

To be sure, Fiedler may create a far better impression at the head of the highly trained Boston orchestra than he did two and a half years ago when he struggled with our own ponderous Philharmonic band. The medium of interpretation is an important element. It is doubtful Dr. Muck would have won as great distinction with the Philharmonic colossus as with Boston's aggregation of virtuosi. Safonoff's Slavic temperament would be ill suited to Boston's refined demands, whereas it compels obedience and inspires enthusiasm in an orchestra with which many "prime donnas of the baton" have wrestled in vain. Yet Fiedler is one of the last conductors this writer would have chosen as worthy of Muck's place. In Pohlig the Philadelphia orchestra has a much better man.

Fiedler was the Philharmonic Society's third "star" conductor of the season of 1905-6. He had charge of the concerts of Friday afternoon, December 15, and Saturday evening, December 16, 1905, in Carnegie Hall. Johanna Gadski was the soloist. The programme comprised the prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; an aria from Karl Eckert's "William of Oranga"; Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"; the recitative and aria, "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. From the start the conductor disappointed those who were not prepossessed in his favor. Dissatisfaction came with the first bars of the "Meistersinger" prelude, which the conductor took at an extremely slow pace, with an exaggerated pomposity that made one wish for the heat and passion of Hertz, with all its lack of repose and solemnity.

Did Fiedler keep up this drawling tempo in the "Meistersinger" prelude? No, indeed! The record in The Press shows that he went to the opposite extreme when his nervous temperament could no longer bear the shackles of patient progress. His way of whipping up his men into bursts of speed or drawing taut the reins with a sudden jerk, mindless of the size of the team he was trying to guide, was exciting to behold but irritating to hear. His reading of the Wagner prelude was full of extravagances, but these were not confined to tempo. One noted as great a fondness for screaming dynamic contrasts, a tendency that was apparent throughout the concert, even in Beethoven's symphony, though that work, on the whole, was his most satisfying contribution.

How about Fiedler's performance of Strauss's "Don Juan?" The new conductor, it is said, is an enthusiastic, though not fanatic champion of modern music. To the writer for The Press the Strauss performance was on a still lower level of effectiveness than Fiedler's reading of Wagner's prelude. Whereas Fiedler had begun the other work at a lubberly tempo he dashed off into the opening measures of Strauss's music as if he intended to make minced meat out of that fleshly score. In fact, the director from the famous Hansa city of Germany, driving our good men of the Philharmonic Society as hard as he could, succeeded almost in converting the tone-poem into a sort of Hamburger steak, so swiftly and savagely did the big band under Fiedler's cantankerous guidance hack their way through its substance.

Spurred to the same output of energy and velocity a smaller and more sensitive body of players, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would have given better satisfaction. Yet our best conductors weigh the medium they have at their disposal carefully and shape their interpretations accordingly, just as the greatest singers adapt and shape their interpretations to the condition of their voices, just as the world's masters of the piano mold their playing to the character of the instrument they are persuaded to manipulate. This power of adjusting the end to the means, of aiming no higher than the intermedium safely permits, of gauging correctly the possibilities of the interpretative agent or instrument, be it mechanical or physical, and of forming a plan accordingly, is, indeed, a mark of all true greatness in interpretative art.

We observe this artistic balance, for example, in Gustav Mahler, who has been willing, to the mystification of some listeners, to sacrifice many a minor effect in the Metropolitan Opera House for the sake of concentrating the efforts of an overworked orchestra on things which seemed to him of more essential importance. Fiedler apparently lacks this power, to judge from his two appearances in New York; or else he has not sufficient control over refractory nerves. His reading of the Strauss tone-poem suffered through an excess of nervous irritability and a deficiency of power and poise. Rhythmically, the performance by the Philharmonic men was unsound, and this appeared to be not so much the fault of the big orchestra as of the Hamburg conductor, who simply demanded more than his men were able to give. So unsatisfactory a performance of Strauss's "Don Juan" we had never heard before and never have heard since.

That Boston's music-critical rhapsodist, H. T. Parker, whom the Transcript took away from a New York paper, should weave so tough a thread into the glowing web of his verbal texture as the suggestion that Dr. Muck is high in the second rank rather than in the very first rank of his calling, is almost shocking. "Weingartner or Nikisch, Mottl or Mahler, to name the four most distinguished 'international' conductors, could hardly be persuaded now to our orchestra," Parker asserts. "Their engagements in the opera house or in other concerts, the price that they set upon themselves, and the conditions they would impose upon their work are all alike..."

...Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 8 1908

MUSIC NOTES.

The last Boston Symphony con... the season will be given in the ... Temple on Friday evening, Marc... This concert will be noteworthy ... interesting reasons. It will ... Muck's farewell appearance in Bro... and the last concert the orches... give in the Baptist Temple, for ... fall the splendid new music hall ... used for these concerts. Dr. Muck ... ranged for this concert a progra... classic music which promises a most ... lightful evening's entertainment. The ... works will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn's G major symphony No. 6, the delightfully melodious "Surprise" symphony; and Mozart's Symphony in D major.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR - 8 1908

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 20. This concert will be noteworthy for two interesting reasons. It will be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Brooklyn and the last concert the orchestra will give in the Baptist Temple, for by next fall the splendid new music hall will be used for these concerts. Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert a programme of classic music which promises a most delightful evening's entertainment. The works will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn's G major symphony No. 6, the delightful melodious "Surprise" symphony, and Mozart's symphony in D major.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR - 8 1908

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert-master and a new second concert-master in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concert master in Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to leave was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the orchestra might retain his very valuable services. He expects next summer to be concert-master at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason he was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

...Daily Times,
...Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 7 1908

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that August Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Carl Muck, who has been unable to get a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of next season.

This orchestra director, who is also a pianist and composer, was born in Zittau in 1859. He studied the piano with his father and theory and organ playing with G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil in the Leipsic Conservatory. In 1882 he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory, and often appeared publicly as a piano player. He has composed a piano quintet, a string quartet, a symphony in D minor, and several songs and piano pieces.

...Daily Citizen,
...Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 8 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 20. This concert will be noteworthy for two interesting reasons. It will be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Brooklyn, and the last concert the orchestra will give in the Baptist Temple, for by next fall the splendid new music hall will be used for these concerts. Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert a programme of classical music which promises a most delightful evening's entertainment. The works will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn's G major symphony, No. 6, the delightfully melodious "Surprise" symphony; and Mozart's Symphony in D major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...LEDGER
...PHILA, PA.
MAR 6 - 1908

TO LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

August Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, to Be Conductor Next Season.

The announcement that August Max Fiedler, pianist, composer and orchestral director, of Hamburg, is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season has been received with uncommon interest by musicians in this city. The place of the orchestra here is so assured that there was general speculation regarding the personality of the man who might succeed Dr. Karl Muck in the musical directorship, and animated discussion of the new conductor following the specific announcement.

Mr. Fiedler is 49 years of age, a native of Zittau. He has developed his career so quietly that though his achievement is already notable, there is comparatively little to chronicle of the various steps upon which his reputation has been built. His first teacher at the piano was his father, this instruction being supplemented by lessons from Albrecht in theory and organ playing. In 1877 he gained a scholarship in the Leipsic Conservatory, remaining there for three years. After a brief career as soloist he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory in 1882, though he did not allow this entirely to supersede his public work as a pianist.

Mr. Fiedler is a composer of resource, his more important and better known writings including a piano quintet, string quartet, minor songs and piano pieces, with a symphony in D minor as his most elaborate work. He is at present conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler will not come as a stranger to America, having visited this country in 1906 as guest conductor in a series of concerts given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...RECORD
...PHILADELPHIA, P...
MAR 5 - 1903

New Leader for Boston Symphony.

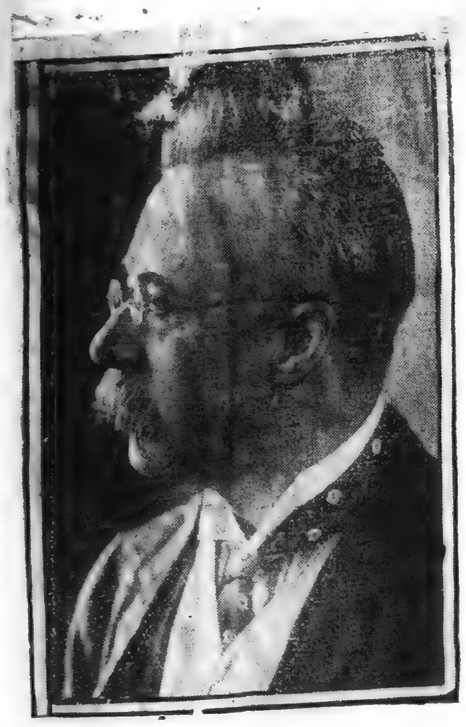
Boston, March 4.—Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

...RECORD
...PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 8 - 1908

—Mr. and Mrs. Herman ... of No. 807 Spruce street, will give a musicale at the Acorn Club on ... March 16, at 3.30 o'clock. ... will be music by the Theodarwiez ... of the Boston Symphony Orches...

[162]

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
Date 1908



MAX FIEDLER.
...e new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who has been engaged to succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not wholly a stranger to the patrons of orchestral concerts in New York. He was one of the foreign conductors brought hither by the Philharmonic Society to conduct one of its concerts three seasons ago. On December 15 and 16, 1905, he conducted two concerts, at which the programme consisted of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, this number, together with the scene and air "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio," having been placed upon the programme in recognition of the anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Fiedler made a fine impression, and was applauded with great enthusiasm at both concerts. The opinion of The Tribune's reviewer was thus set down:

A masterful, a wise, a keenly analytical, a lucid and inspiriting conductor is Mr. Fiedler. His technical methods are admirably intelligible, his devotion to the work in hand is complete. A finer performance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" can scarcely be imagined. It was splendidly illuminative of the elements which Wagner's comedy presents in conflict—the square toed rule of thumb march melodies of the pedantic guildmen, the eager, pulsating, passionate melodies of the lovers standing as the representatives of romanticism. The characterization was vivid, and the piece throbbed with vitality. In the symphony there was no striving for effects not justified by the printed page. His tempi in the first and last movements were more animated than those to which we are accustomed. Whether or not this was a blemish is largely a matter of taste. They were consistently carried out and did not spoil the symmetry of the picture. Altogether it was as notable an accomplishment as any which we have had to record since the Philharmonic Society adopted its present policy.

Mr. Fiedler comes from Hamburg and, we believe, has an American wife. He has conducted symphony concerts in Paris, St. Petersburg and Madrid, and enjoys an enviable reputation in his native Germany. He was born in Zittau on December 31, 1859, where he made his first studies with his father. Subsequently he studied at the Leipzig Conservatorium (1877-'80), where he won the Holstein scholarship. He became a member of the faculty of the Hamburg Conservatory in 1882, and has been conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic concerts for the last seven or eight years. He has made dignified essays in the field of composition.

TRIBUNE
From
New York City.
Address
8- 1908

"California, Her Mountains and Valleys," will be the topic of the next illustrated lecture which Frederick Monsen will deliver under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences at Association Hall on Saturday afternoon and evening. Mr. Monsen will complete the series on March 21 with a lecture on Arizona. On March 12 the Kneisel String Quartet will give a chamber music concert at Association Hall in the evening. On the evening of Friday, March 20, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth and last concert of the season at the Baptist Temple. On March 28 Garrett P. Serviss will give the first of his course of four illustrated lectures at Association Hall. The course will include afternoon as well as evening talks. The topics will be "The Alps," "Spain," "Venice" and "Rome." On March 30 Leslie Harris, known as England's greatest entertainer, will appear in the evening at Association Hall. His programme will consist of humorous and musical "sketches." Jan Kubelik will play in the Baptist Temple on the evening of March 19. It will be his second violin recital in the borough. Kubelik will be assisted by Mlle. Berthe Roy, pianist. Herr Ludwig Schwab will act as accompanist.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...n
...ress
...e

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 16.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
... 1908

SONGS AND SINGERS.

It is disappointing news that so great a conductor as Dr. Muck is to be succeeded by a man of Max Fiedler's lesser attainments. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new musical director is, we are informed, a warm personal friend of Muck. It was Muck, indeed, who recommended him to the powers that be. Friendship, however, is no mark of merit. History is full of examples of the greater stepping into the arena for the lesser. Fiedler surely will not replace Muck in the affection of Boston and New York audiences, and should Muck return to his present post after an interim of Fiedler it is probable he will be welcomed with open arms.

To be sure, Fiedler may create a far better impression at the head of the highly trained Boston orchestra than he did two and a half years ago when he struggled with our own ponderous Philharmonic band. The medium of interpretation is an important element. It is doubtful Dr. Muck would have won as great distinction with the Philharmonic colossus as with Boston's aggregation of virtuosi. Safonoff's Slavic temperament would be ill suited to Boston's refined demands, whereas it compels obedience and inspires enthusiasm in an orchestra with which many "prima donnas of the baton" have wrestled in vain. Yet Fiedler is one of the last conductors this writer would have chosen as worthy of Muck's place. In Pohlig the Philadelphia orchestra has a much better man.

Fiedler was the Philharmonic Society's third "star" conductor of the season of 1905-6. He had charge of the concerts of Friday afternoon, December 15, and Saturday evening, December 16, 1905, in Carnegie Hall. Johanna Gadski was the soloist. The programme comprised the prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; an aria from Karl Eckert's "William of Orange"; Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"; the recitative and aria, "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. From the start the conductor disappointed those who were not prepossessed in his favor. Dissatisfaction came with the first bars of the "Meistersinger" prelude, which the conductor took at an extremely slow pace, with an exaggerated pomposity that made one wish for the heat and passion of Hertz, with all its lack of repose and solemnity.

Did Fiedler keep up this drawling tempo in the "Meistersinger" prelude? No, indeed! The record in The Press shows that he went to the opposite extreme when his nervous temperament could no longer bear the shackles of patient progress. His way of whipping up his men into bursts of speed or drawing taut the reins with a sudden jerk, mindless of the size of the team he was trying to guide, was exciting to behold but irritating to hear. His reading of the Wagner prelude was full of extravagances, but these were not confined to tempo. One noted as great a fondness for screaming dynamic contrasts, a tendency that was apparent throughout the concert, even in Beethoven's symphony, though that work, on the whole, was his most satisfying contribution.

How about Fiedler's performance of Strauss's "Don Juan?" The new conductor, it is said, is an enthusiastic, though not fanatic champion of modern music. To the writer for The Press the Strauss performance was on a still lower level of effectiveness than Fiedler's reading of Wagner's prelude. Whereas Fiedler had begun the other work at a lubberly tempo he dashed off into the opening measures of Strauss's music as if he intended to make minced meat out of that fleshly score. In fact, the director from the famous Hansa city of Germany, driving our good men of the Philharmonic Society as hard as he could, succeeded almost in converting the tone-poem into a sort of Hamburger steak, so swiftly and savagely did the big band under Fiedler's cantankerous guidance hack their way through its substance.

Spurred to the same output of energy and velocity, a smaller and more acrobatic body of players, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would have given better satisfaction. Yet our best conductors weigh the medium they have at their disposal carefully and shape their interpretations accordingly, just as the greatest singers adapt and shape their interpretations to the condition of their voices, just as the world's masters of the piano mold their playing to the character of the instrument they are persuaded to manipulate. This power of adjusting the end to the means, of aiming no higher than the intermedium safely permits, of gauging correctly the possibilities of the interpretative agent or instrument, be it mechanical or physical, and of forming a plan accordingly, is, indeed, a mark of all true greatness in interpretative art.

We observe this artistic balance, for example, in Gustav Hahler, who has been willing, to the mystification of some listeners, to sacrifice many a minor effect in the Metropolitan Opera House for the sake of concentrating the efforts of an overworked orchestra on things which seemed to him of more essential importance. Fiedler apparently lacks this power, to judge from his two appearances in New York; or else he has not sufficient control over refractory nerves. His reading of the Strauss tone-poem suffered through an excess of nervous irritability and a deficiency of power and poise. Rhythmically, the performance by the Philharmonic men was unsound, and this appeared to be not so much the fault of the big orchestra as of the Hamburg conductor, who simply demanded more than his men were able to give. So unsatisfactory a performance of Strauss's "Don Juan" we had never heard before and never have heard since.

That Boston's musico-critical rhapsodist, H. T. Parker, whom the Transcript took away from a New York paper, should weave so rough a thread into the glowing web of his verbal texture as the suggestion that Dr. Muck is high in the second rank rather than in the very first rank of his calling is almost shocking. "Weingartner or Nikisch, Mottl or Mahler, to name the four most distinguished 'international' conductors, could hardly be persuaded now to our orchestra," Parker asserts. "Their engagements in the opera house or in other concerts, the price that they set upon themselves, and the conditions they would impose upon their work are all ...

...our orchestra ... to ... wide-spreading note and exalted notion, but of little less ability and individuality. Such a choice was Mr. Gericke and such in a measure was Dr. Muck." Does Mr. Parker of Boston mean to have us infer that because Weingartner, Nikisch, Mottl and Mahler ask greater remuneration for their services than does Dr. Muck, therefore they are to be ranked higher? Can so vulgar a suggestion come from a centre of culture and from the pen of so exquisite a painter in words as Mr. Parker? Would Mr. Parker say that Safonoff ranked higher than Muck because of his bigger salary? Decidedly, Fiedler is not among the foremost living conductors; in that we crude New Yorkers may agree with the excellent Mr. Parker. Maybe he is not even "high in the second rank." But Dr. Muck deserves only one place, and that is in line with the very greatest men of his profession.

Parker has "a personal impression of Max Fiedler," which he obtained at his New York appearances and at a concert in London last spring. "To the eye," says he, "the conductor was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, a la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin." As to his conducting, "Mr. Fiedler seemed steadily to seek warmth, beauty and euphony of tone. * * * Not once in London was the tone of the band harsh, rough or careless. Nowhere, however, did the beauty, balance and precision of the tone lessen its vitality or its expressive quality." Mr. Parker is highly enthusiastic.

MAX SMITH.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR - 8 1908

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert-master and a new second concert-master in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concert master in Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to leave was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the orchestra might retain his very valuable services. He expects next summer to be concert-master at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason he was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

...Times,
...s
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 7 1908

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that August Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Carl Muck, who has been unable to get a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of next season.

This orchestra director, who is also a pianist and composer, was born in Zittau in 1859. He studied the piano with his father and theory and organ playing with G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil in the Leipsic Conservatory. In 1882 he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory, and often appeared publicly as a piano player. He has composed a piano quintet, a string quartet, a symphony in D minor, and several songs and piano pieces.

...om
...ress
Brooklyn, N. Y.
...te
MAR 8 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 20. This concert will be noteworthy for two interesting reasons. It will be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Brooklyn, and the last concert the orchestra will give in the Baptist Temple, for by next fall the splendid new music hall will be used for these concerts. Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert a programme of classical music which promises a most delightful evening's entertainment. The works will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn's G major symphony, No. 6, the delightfully melodious "Surprise" symphony; and Mozart's Symphony in D major.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 8 1908

MUSIC NOTES.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 20. This concert will be noteworthy for two interesting reasons. It will be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Brooklyn and the last concert the orchestra will give in the Baptist Temple, for by next fall the splendid new music hall will be used for these concerts. Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert a programme of classic music which promises a most delightful evening's entertainment. The works will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn's G major symphony No. 6, the delightfully melodious "Surprise" symphony; and Mozart's Symphony in D major.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR - 8 1908

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 20. This concert will be noteworthy for two interesting reasons. It will be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Brooklyn and the last concert the orchestra will give in the Baptist Temple, for by next fall the splendid new music hall will be used for these concerts. Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert a programme of classic music which promises a most delightful evening's entertainment. The works will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn's G major symphony No. 6, the delightfully melodious "Surprise" symphony, and Mozart's symphony in D major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om
...dress
...te

TO LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTR...

August Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, to Be Conductor Next Season.

The announcement that August Max Fiedler, pianist, composer and orchestral director, of Hamburg, is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season has been received with uncommon interest by musicians in this city. The place of the orchestra here is so assured that there was general speculation regarding the personality of the man who might succeed Dr. Karl Muck in the musical directorship, and animated discussion of the new conductor following the specific announcement.

Mr. Fiedler is 49 years of age, a native of Zittau. He has developed his career so quietly that though his achievement is already notable, there is comparatively little to chronicle of the various steps upon which his reputation has been built. His first teacher at the piano was his father, this instruction being supplemented by lessons from Albrecht in theory and organ playing. In 1877 he gained a scholarship in the Leipsic Conservatory, remaining there for three years. After a brief career as soloist he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory in 1882, though he did not allow this entirely to supersede his public work as a pianist.

Mr. Fiedler is a composer of resource, his more important and better known writings including a piano quintet, a string quartet, minor songs and piano pieces, with a symphony in D minor as his most elaborate work. He is at present conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler will not come as a stranger to America, having visited this country in 1905 as guest conductor in a series of concerts given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om
...dress
...te

New Leader for Boston Symphony.

Boston, March 4.—Max Fielder, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Fielder will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

—Mr. and Mrs. Herman V. Hilprecht, of No. 807 Spruce street, will give a musicale at the Acorn Club on Monday, March 16, at 3.30 o'clock. There will be music by the Theodarwiez Quartet, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[162]

ITEM.
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 5- 1908

THE PASSING OF DR. KARL MUCK

Boston, March 5.—Dr. Karl Muck proved anything but a brilliant success, and there are many who will not weep at his departure, for last night it was announced by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who will go back to Berlin and probably never be seen again in America.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season.

Mr. Fiedler is known in New York although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905. George W. Chadwick, of the New England Conservatory of Music, knew him at Leipzig.

Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859 and has devoted his life to music. He was a pianist in Germany before he became a conductor. Those who remember him do not enthuse over him.

The Most Extensive and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 8- 1908

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

The fourth Tschaikowsky Symphony is announced for presentation at the Orchestra concerts this week, and if this were not in itself of sufficient popular appeal, an additional feature of the programme will be Beethoven's great Emperor Concerto to be played by Teresa Carreno. The intense sympathy and reverence for the writings of this master ever expressed by the famous Spanish pianist promise a notable presentation of this work, played here last by Paderewski at one of the Boston Symphony concerts. The Tschaikowsky symphony is that in which the composer wrote a tonal tribute to the inspiring friendship which existed between himself and Frau Nadeshda von Meck, the noble woman from whom Tschaikowsky received spiritual encouragement as well as the financial assistance which were both so necessary to his career. This symphony was announced for the concerts in February, but postponed on account of the railroad accident.

[illegible] of a Philadelphia composer on the programme is also welcome, "In the Garden of the Gods," a manuscript composition by Wassili Leps, heading the list for this week, the concert ending with Carl Goldmark's overture, "In Spring."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 5- 1908

TO TAKE DR. MUCK'S PLACE

Max Fiedler Engaged as Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, March 5.—It was announced last night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to obtain a longer leave of absence from Berlin.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season.

Mr. Fiedler is known in New York, although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905, and made a success. George W. Chadwick, of the New England Conservatory of Music, knew him at Leipzig and speaks highly of him.

Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler were fellow students in the Leipzig Conservatory. Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859 and has devoted his life to music. He was a leading pianist in Germany before he became a conductor.

BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 7- 1908

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 16. This will be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck in Philadelphia. The program will include Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's Indian Suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish airs.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 5- 1908

[illegible] Boston that Mr. [illegible] succeed [illegible] the Boston Sym[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 8- 1908

MUCK FAREWELL CONCERT

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy on March 16. This will be Doctor Muck's farewell appearance in this city, the programme being Beethoven's pastoral symphony, MacDowell's Indian suite and the Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Airs.

In addition to a new conductor, next season will bring to America a new concert master for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as a new second concert master, in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling returns to his position as concertmaster in Stuttgart, and expects next summer to hold the same position in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr. Czerwonky leaves in order to pursue a career as a concert soloist. Successors in both positions will be chosen later in the spring.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 8- 1908

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week. This will also be the farewell appearance of Dr. Carl Muck in this city. The program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's Indian suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish airs.

In addition to having a new conducter next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master, in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 5- 1908

NEW ORCHESTRA DIRECTOR

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. Engaged for Boston Symphony.

Boston, March 4.—It was announced tonight by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

QUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
MAR 8- 1908

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 16. This will also be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck in this city. The program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's Indian Suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Airs.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, M
MARCH 14, 1908

Symphony Rehearsal.

For the eighteenth symphony rehearsal yesterday there was the usual crowd out and more men than I've seen there in several weeks. It was pleasant to learn that some of the Back Bay society women have formed the habit, when they cannot attend, of allowing someone, through Mr. Comee, to occupy their seats, and this happened yesterday when several were unable to secure sittings.

In the crowd I saw Mr. and Mrs. T. Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mr. Grew, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson with her pretty daughter-in-law, Mrs. A. Henry Higginson, looking the picture of health in a blue gown, long fur coat and large hat, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean with Mrs. L. Cartaret Fenno, Mrs. Charles J. Rich, very handsomely gowned, brown prevailing; Nathan Haskell Dole, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Miss Lizzie MacNichol, Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mrs. Shattuck, her daughter, Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson, Mrs. B. F. Pitman, regal in black velvet; Mrs. Edwin U. Curtis, Mrs. S. Huntington Wolcott, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Ethel Gibson, Mrs. William A. Gaston, Mrs. Arthur Aston Carey, Mrs. John Devlin, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Katherine Foote, Miss Winthrop Sargent, Mrs. [illegible] Stevens Bingham, Mrs. [illegible], Mrs. Frederick [illegible] Dana Shepard, [illegible], Mrs. C. H. [illegible] McCormick, Mrs. Horatio [illegible] others.

[163]

Journal :
Date : 29 JANVIER 1908
Adresse :
Signé :

Traitements de Musiciens.

On parle souvent des traitements fastueux que les chanteurs en renom obtiennent en Amérique. Les chefs d'orchestre ne sont pas moins favorisés. Un journal nous apprend qu'à l'Opéra de Manhattan de New-York, M. Campanini a 5.000 francs par semaine, tandis qu'au Métropolitain, M. Gustave Mahler reçoit 100.000 francs pour la saison, du 1er février au 15 avril. M. Muck, de son côté, reçoit de la Société symphonique de Boston 75.000 francs pour une saison de cinq mois ; la Société des concerts de Pittsbourg donne 60.000 francs à son chef d'orchestre, M. Emile Paur, et M. Carl Pohlig a 40.000 francs à Philadelphie.

Quant aux virtuoses, cela devient fantastique. Quand M. Paderewski fait une tournée de quatre-vingts concerts, on lui garantit un minimum de 7.500 francs par séance, mais sa tournée lui rapporte presque le double, soit environ 1.100.000 francs.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, MARCH 12, 1908

MILY BALAKIREFF

A NEW NAME AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Composer Whose Symphony Is to Be Heard for the First Time Tomorrow—His Peculiar Place and Influence in Russian Music—His Busy Career and Present Seclusion—His Music in the Larger and the Smaller Forms and Its Traits—The Man as Intimates Have Seen Him

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

It is perhaps unnecessary to assert that the so-called Neo-Russian school of composers occupies a distinctive position in the evolution of modern music. For their works, aside from the intrinsic qualities they possess as music, reflect two important tendencies which have exerted a wide influence. One is the intimate association of Russian mythology and folk-lore in symphonic composition and in opera, as a means of evoking imaginative sensibility in composer and listener alike; the other an insistent predilection for employing folk-song as thematic material to arrive at a more definite national flavor. For these features of their art, they owe the primal initiative in great part to the quiet enthusiasm, the pedagogic insight and the virtually patriarchal authority of Mily Balakireff, whose name will appear on the programme of the Symphony Concert for the first time this week. An earnest if not prolific composer, retiring and modest, as far as pushing his works toward publicity or performance is concerned, he has, nevertheless, written music of a charm and significance that deserves attention in addition to his really eminent services as a propagandist.

Mily Alexeievitch Balakireff was born at Nijni-Novgorod, Jan. 3, 1837. It is said that he owed instruction in the rudiments of music to his mother, but the most significant influence in his early years was his association with Oulibicheff, a Mozart enthusiast and biographer, and the author of a pamphlet decrying the later works of Beethoven. In Oulibicheff's library Balakireff learned to know the classic masterpieces, while his private orchestra taught him something of the elements of orchestral effect. Moreover, life in the provinces remote from the great capitals of St. Petersburg and Moscow undoubtedly tended to instil a love for folk-song which has remained an abiding factor in his musical creed. At the age of twenty, after a course of study in the University of Kazan, he came to St. Petersburg prepared to preach the gospel of nationalism in music at a time when Bellini and Meyerbeer occupied the attention of the musical public. On this account he was cordially received by Glinka the real source of Russian nationalist music, at that time smarting under the indifference with which his national opera "Russian and Ludmilla" had been received. For Glinka readily perceived in him a possible continuator of his own work. In a short time Balakireff became the apostle of an organized effort in the direction of a nationalist movement in music. The first to be attracted to his standard was César Cui, then a sub-lieutenant in the corps of engineers, and later a professor of fortification.

The next adherent was Modeste Moussorgsky, who had resigned from the army in order to devote himself to music. Later Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, the naval officer, and Alexander Borodin the chemist were added to this group. The basis of Balakireff's instruction was a thorough analytical discussion of the masterpieces of musical literature from Bach to Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, not in a conventional manner, but independent of tradition; a careful consideration, in the case of orchestral works, of the means of obtaining instrumental effect. He aimed at formulating the æsthetic doctrines underlying the various forms of composition, rather than a mere preoccupation with their technical construction. Finally he strove by active exhortation to originality of style and expression to secure the adoption of Russian folk-song as a thematic basis for composition. It is pointed out that this insistence upon individual liberty of expression came shortly after the emancipation of the serfs, when the awakening necessity for personal and intellectual free[illegible] was in the air. [illegible] increase the scope of his activity, [illegible] in 1[illegible] with in St. Petersburg. For a time this school exercised a real and beneficial influence. One important result achieved by this school was that at its concerts Balakireff produced works by Borodin, Cui and Moussorgsky for the first time. In 1869, Balakireff was appointed director of the Imperial Chapel, and conductor of the Imperial Russian Musical Society.

In the concerts of the latter society Balakireff also did much to promote the interests of his disciples by giving their works. After some years, however, the free school came to an end. Of the causes which led to its abandonment, Borodin wrote to Madame Karmaline (a niece of Glinka): "You have doubtless heard of the disruption of our school. It is not astonishing. So long as we were eggs laid by one hen (and that hen Balakireff) we were all more or less alike; but when the young chickens came out of their shells each one clothed himself in different feathers, and when our wings had grown each one flew away in a different direction." Nevertheless Balakireff's missionary work in formulating the lines on which Russian composers should labor had been accomplished and acceptance of his main principles had become an established fact. He had the satisfaction of seeing produced many orchestral compositions in which folk-song formed much of the constituent material, as well as many operas whose plots were found in tales of Russian legend and folk-lore. Moreover these traits have persisted in the most characteristic Russian music to the present time. For many years Balakireff has led a life of seclusion from public service, although he has continued to compose and publish revisions of earlier works.

If, as a composer, Balakireff has not attained either the original distinction or the mastery of expression acquired by some of his younger adherents, he has nevertheless produced some works of indubitable significance. He does not manifest fertility of invention, or uniform quality, but his compositions are seldom uninteresting. His earliest works are three overtures, one on Spanish themes (composed in 1857, rewritten in 1869), at the instigation of Glinka; one on Russian themes (one of which appeared twenty years later in the finale of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony) dating from 1858; and lastly one on Czechish themes composed in 1867. Of greater musical imsical importance was the incidental music (overture and entr'acts) for a performance of "King Lear," dating from 1861. This overture, doubtless in a revised version, was published in 1904. It has a definite programme, and reveals able differentiation of characters and mood, but hardly the level of Shakspeare's tragedy. In 1862, Balakireff composed a symphonic poem, "Russia," for the one thousandth anniversary of the Russian empire, founded, as one might naturally suppose, on national melodies. It is said that this work was intended to summarize the various epochs in Russian history. A symphonic poem, "In Bohemia" (composed in 1867, revised and published in 1906) and a symphony (1898) to be played here tomorrow have for thematic material Czechish and Russian folk songs respectively.

These latter works display the zealous nationalist, rather than the individual poet which Balakireff's best compositions proclaim him. His instrumental masterpiece is undoubtedly his symphonic poem "Tamara" (1877-1884), after a poem by Lermontoff. Its theme is the Georgian princess Tamara. In the narrow pass of Darial, where the river Terek roars amidst the mists, rises an ancient tower. Here lived the Princess Tamara, who is described as having the aspect of an angel, a demon in her thoughts, at once cruel, wily and divine. At her seductive appeal the passers-by entered to take part in wild nocturnal festivities. Throughout the night the cries of the revellers were heard, but at dawn the sounds ceased abruptly with a sinister and dread silence. The Terek alone broke the quiet, boiling furiously, sweeping before it the inanimate body of Tamara's lover, while she at the window like a white shadow sent forth an adieu to the beloved, a farewell which breathed a tender intoxication. The voice which uttered it had such gentleness that its accents, penetrated with promise, seemed to depict a near and immense happiness. Balakireff has treated this fantastic subject with repressed mystery, ferocity and poetic tenderness. Here he rises above the ardent nationalist to become a poet of imaginative and poignant utterance. "Tamara" is unique among his orchestral works, and to a certain extent almost solitary in the musical literature of his nation. In it his fancy has been fired by the memories of his early travels in the Caucasus. Here the atmosphere of [illegible] ental Russia has produced in him a [illegible] of

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ITEM.

PHILADELPHIA, PA

MAR 5 1908

THE PASSING OF DR. KARL MUCK

Boston, March 5.—Dr. Karl Muck proved anything but a brilliant success, and there are many who will not weep at his departure, for last night it was announced by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who will go back to Berlin and probably never be seen again in America.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season.

Mr. Fiedler is known in New York although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905. George W. Chadwick, of the New England Conservatory of Music, knew him at Leipzig.

Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859 and has devoted his life to music. He was a pianist in Germany before he became a conductor. Those who remember him do not enthuse over him.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

The fourth Tschaikowsky Symphony is announced for presentation at the Orchestra concerts this week, and if this were not in itself of sufficient popular appeal, an additional feature of the programme will be Beethoven's great Emperor Concerto to be played by Teresa Carreno. The intense sympathy and reverence for the writings of this master ever expressed by the famous Spanish pianist promise a notable presentation of this work, played here last by Paderewski at one of the Boston Symphony concerts. The Tschaikowsky symphony is that in which the composer wrote a tonal tribute to the inspiring friendship which existed between himself and Frau Nadeshda von Meck, the noble woman from whom Tschaikowsky received spiritual encouragement as well as the financial assistance which were both so necessary to his career. This symphony was announced for the concerts in February, but postponed on account of the railroad accident.

[illegible] on the programme is also welcome, "In the Garden of the Gods," a manuscript composition by Wassili Leps, heading the list for this week, the concert ending with Carl Goldmark's overture, "In Spring."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TO TAKE DR. MUCK'S PLACE

Max Fiedler Engaged as Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, March 5.—It was announced last night by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to obtain a longer leave of absence from Berlin.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season.

Mr. Fiedler is known in New York, although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905, and made a success. George W. Chadwick, of the New England Conservatory of Music, knew him at Leipzig and speaks highly of him.

Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler were fellow students in the Leipzig Conservatory. Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859 and has devoted his life to music. He was a leading pianist in Germany before he became a conductor.

BULLETIN

PA

PUBLIC LEDGER

PHILADELPHIA

MAR 5 1908

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 16. This will be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck in Philadelphia. The program will include Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's Indian Suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish airs.

It was announced at Boston that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, would succeed Dr. Karl Muck as director of the Boston Sym-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MUCK FAREWELL CONCERT

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy on March 16. This will be Doctor Muck's farewell appearance in this city, the programme being Beethoven's pastoral symphony, MacDowell's Indian suite and the Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Airs.

In addition to a new conductor, next season will bring to America a new concert master for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as a new second concert master, in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling returns to his position as concertmaster in Stuttgart, and expects next summer to hold the same position in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr. Czerwonky leaves in order to pursue a career as a concert soloist. Successors in both positions will be chosen later in the spring.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PA

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week. This will also be the farewell appearance of Dr. Carl Muck in this city. The program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's Indian suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish airs.

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master, in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work.

NEW ORCHESTRA DIRECTOR

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. Engaged for Boston Symphony.

Boston, March 4.—It was announced tonight by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin.

Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening of the next season.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 16. This will also be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck in this city. The program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's Indian Suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Airs.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1908

Symphony Rehearsal.

For the eighteenth symphony rehearsal yesterday there was the usual crowd out and more men than I've seen there in several weeks. It was pleasant to learn that some of the Back Bay society women have formed the habit, when they cannot attend, of allowing someone, through Mr. Comee, to occupy their seats, and this happened yesterday when several were unable to secure sittings.

In the crowd I saw Mr. and Mrs. T. Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mr. Grew, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson with her pretty daughter-in-law, Mrs. A. Henry Higginson, looking the picture of health in a blue gown, long fur coat and large hat, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean with Mrs. L. Cartaret Fenno, Mrs. Charles J. Rich, very handsomely gowned, brown prevailing; Nathan Haskell Dole, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Miss Lizzie MacNichol, Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mrs. Shattuck, her daughter, Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson; Mrs. B. F. Pitman, regal in black velvet; Mrs. Edwin U. Curtis, Mrs. S Huntington Wolcott, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Ethel Gibson, Mrs. William A. Gaston, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. John Devlin, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mrs. Forbes, Mrs. Kate Stevens Bingham, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, Mrs. William Humphrey, Mrs. C. H. Greenleaf, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, [illegible] Misses.

Journal : Revue Musicale

Date : 29 JANVIER 1908

Adresse : Lyon

Signé :

Traitements de Musiciens.

On parle souvent des traitements fastueux que les chanteurs en renom obtiennent en Amérique. Les chefs d'orchestre ne sont pas moins favorisés. Un journal nous apprend qu'à l'Opéra de Manhattan de New-York, M. Campanini a 5.000 francs par semaine, tandis qu'au Métropolitain, M. Gustave Mahler reçoit 100.000 francs pour la saison, du 1er février au 15 avril. M. Muck, de son côté, reçoit de la Société symphonique de Boston 75.000 francs pour une saison de cinq mois ; la Société des concerts de Pittsbourg donne 60.000 francs à son chef d'orchestre, M. Emile Paur, et M. Carl Pohlig a 40.000 francs à Philadelphie.

Quant aux virtuoses, cela devient fantastique. Quand M. Paderewski fait une tournée de quatre-vingts concerts, on lui garantit un minimum de 7.500 francs par séance, mais sa tournée lui rapporte presque le double, soit environ 1.100.000 francs.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY. MARCH 12, 1908

MILY BALAKIREFF

A NEW NAME AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Composer Whose Symphony Is to Be Heard for the First Time Tomorrow—His Peculiar Place and Influence in Russian Music—His Busy Career and Present Seclusion—His Music in the Larger and the Smaller Forms and Its Traits—The Man as Intimates Have Seen Him

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

It is perhaps unnecessary to assert that the so-called Neo-Russian school of composers occupies a distinctive position in the evolution of modern music. For their works, aside from the intrinsic qualities they possess as music, reflect two important tendencies which have exerted a wide influence. One is the intimate association of Russian mythology and folk-lore in symphonic composition and in opera, as a means of evoking imaginative sensibility in composer and listener alike; the other an insistent predilection for employing folk-song as thematic material to arrive at a more definite national flavor. For these features of their art, they owe the primal initiative in great part to the quiet enthusiasm, the pedagogic insight and the virtually patriarchal authority of Mily Balakireff, whose name will appear on the programme of the Symphony Concert for the first time this week. An earnest if not prolific composer, retiring and modest, as far as pushing his works toward publicity or performance is concerned, he has, nevertheless, written music of a charm and significance that deserves attention in addition to his really eminent services as a propagandist.

Mily Alexeievitch Balakireff was born at Nijni-Novgorod, Jan. 3, 1837. It is said that he owed instruction in the rudiments of music to his mother, but the most significant influence in his early years was his association with Oulibicheff, a Mozart enthusiast and biographer, and the author of a pamphlet decrying the later works of Beethoven. In Oulibicheff's library Balakireff learned to know the classic masterpieces, while his private orchestra taught him something of the elements of orchestral effect. Moreover, life in the provinces remote from the great capitals of St. Petersburg and Moscow undoubtedly tended to instil a love for folk-song which has remained an abiding factor in his musical creed. At the age of twenty, after a course of study in the University of Kazan, he came to St. Petersburg prepared to preach the gospel of nationalism in music at a time when Bellini and Meyerbeer occupied the attention of the musical public. On this account he was cordially received by Glinka the real source of Russian nationalist music, at that time smarting under the indifference with which his national opera "Russian and Ludmilla" had been received. For Glinka readily perceived in him a possible continuator of his own work. In a short time Balakireff became the apostle of an organized effort in the direction of a nationalist movement in music. The first to be attracted to his standard was César Cui, then a sub-lieutenant in the corps of engineers, and later a professor of fortification.

The next adherent was Modeste Moussorgsky, who had resigned from the army in order to devote himself to music. Later Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, the naval officer, and Alexander Borodin the chemist were added to this group. The basis of Balakireff's instruction was a thorough analytical discussion of the masterpieces of musical literature from Bach to Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, not in a conventional manner, but independent of tradition; a careful consideration, in the case of orchestral works, of the means of obtaining instrumental effect. He aimed at formulating the æsthetic doctrines underlying the various forms of composition, rather than a mere preoccupation with their technical construction. Finally he strove by active exhortation to originality of style and expression to secure the adoption of Russian folk-song as a thematic basis for composition. It is pointed out that this insistence upon individual liberty of expression came shortly after the emancipation of the serfs, when the awakening necessity for personal and intellectual freedom was in the air. To increase the scope of his activity, Balakireff, in 1862, with the assistance of the choral conductor, Lomakin, and the musical critic [illegible] in St. Petersburg. For a time this school exercised a real and beneficial influence. One important result achieved by this school was that at its concerts Balakireff produced works by Borodin, Cui and Moussorgsky for the first time. In 1869, Balakireff was appointed director of the Imperial Chapel, and conductor of the Imperial Russian Musical Society.

In the concerts of the latter society Balakireff also did much to promote the interests of his disciples by giving their works. After some years, however, the free school came to an end. Of the causes which led to its abandonment, Borodin wrote to Madame Karmaline (a niece of Glinka): "You have doubtless heard of the disruption of our school. It is not astonishing. So long as we were eggs laid by one hen (and that hen Balakireff) we were all more or less alike; but when the young chickens came out of their shells each one clothed himself in different feathers, and when our wings had grown each one flew away in a different direction." Nevertheless Balakireff's missionary work in formulating the lines on which Russian composers should labor had been accomplished and acceptance of his main principles had become an established fact. He had the satisfaction of seeing produced many orchestral compositions in which folk-song formed much of the constituent material, as well as many operas whose plots were found in tales of Russian legend and folk-lore. Moreover these traits have persisted in the most characteristic Russian music to the present time. For many years Balakireff has led a life of seclusion from public service, although he has continued to compose and publish revisions of earlier works.

If, as a composer, Balakireff has not attained either the original distinction or the mastery of expression acquired by some of his younger adherents, he has nevertheless produced some works of indubitable significance. He does not manifest fertility of invention, or uniform quality, but his compositions are seldom uninteresting. His earliest works are three overtures, one on Spanish themes (composed in 1857, rewritten in 1869), at the instigation of Glinka; one on Russian themes (one of which appeared twenty years later in the finale of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony) dating from 1858; and lastly one on Czechish themes composed in 1867. Of greater musical imsical importance was the incidental music (overture and entr'acts) for a performance of "King Lear," dating from 1861. This overture, doubtless in a revised version, was published in 1904. It has a definite programme, and reveals able differentiation of characters and mood, but hardly the level of Shakspeare's tragedy. In 1862, Balakireff composed a symphonic poem, "Russia," for the one thousandth anniversary of the Russian empire, founded, as one might naturally suppose, on national melodies. It is said that this work was intended to summarize the various epochs in Russian history. A symphonic poem, "In Bohemia" (composed in 1867, revised and published in 1906) and a symphony (1898) to be played here tomorrow have for thematic material Czechish and Russian folk songs respectively.

These latter works display the zealous nationalist, rather than the individual poet which Balakireff's best compositions proclaim him. His instrumental masterpiece is undoubtedly his symphonic poem "Tamara" (1877-1884), after a poem by Leimontoff. Its theme is the Georgian princess Tamara. In the narrow pass of Darial, where the river Terek roars amidst the mists, rises an ancient tower. Here lived the Princess Tamara, who is described as having the aspect of an angel, a demon in her thoughts, at once cruel, wily and divine. At her seductive appeal the passers-by entered to take part in wild nocturnal festivities. Throughout the night the cries of the revellers were heard, but at dawn the sounds ceased abruptly with a sinister and dread silence. The Terek alone broke the quiet, boiling furiously, sweeping before it the inanimate body of Tamara's lover, while she at the window like a white shadow sent forth an adieu to the beloved, a farewell which breathed a tender intoxication. The voice which uttered it had such gentleness that its accents, penetrated with promise, seemed to depict a near and immense happiness. Balakireff has treated this fantastic subject with repressed mystery, ferocity and poetic tenderness. Here he rises above the ardent nationalist to become a poet of imaginative and poignant utterance. "Tamara" is unique among his orchestral works, and to a certain extent almost solitary in the musical literature of his nation. In it his fancy has been fired by the memories of his early travels in the Caucasus. Here the atmosphere of Oriental Russia has awakened in him a fulness of expression which he has scarcely [illegible] piano style, harmonic originality and refinement, and much grace of personality. Some of them are written in a virtuoso idiom which is a bar to popularity, others full of charm and poetry belong in the category of salon music, although of an elevated order. He has also made brilliant and effective transcriptions, a Spanish melody by Glinka, arrangements of the same author's "Jota Aragonese" and "Komarinskaja," and a song, "The Lark," which has figured to some extent on concert programmes. There is also a brilliant fantasy on themes from Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Tsar." Stimulating and interesting as these pieces are, it has remained for the Russian Orient again to arouse Balakireff to his most individual achievement in piano music, the Oriental fantasy "Islamey" on Georgian themes. Here is a work absolutely sui generis in the whole range of piano literature. Of gorgeous and exotic imagination, with a wholly novel piano style that in some respects eclipses even the brilliant idiom of Liszt,—in its emotional contrasts, skilful and unusual modulations and spontaneous treatment it displays a genius which Balakireff has never equalled in all his writings for piano. Liszt was devoted to the piece, and lost no chance to make it known. It has been played in Boston by MacDowell, Siloti, Carlo Buonamici, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann and doubtless by others.

Balakireff's songs, of which he has published no less than forty, are virtually unknown in this country at least, although to some they constitute an important portion of his creative work. Mrs. Newmarch in an article on Balakireff has this to say about them: "A series of songs published between 1858 and 1860 attest the rare qualities of a master jeweller. They are indeed little gems, cut in numberless facets, of which each reflects an exquisite and subtle emotion. The accompaniments to these songs resemble the setting of a jewel,—they are independent, but they enhance, they complete the musical thought which glistens at the centre. Such are, for example, the songs 'When Thy Beloved Voice I Hear,' 'Come to Me,' 'Lead Me, O Night,' 'Ecstasy,' 'The Song of the Golden Fish,' 'The Song of Selim' and a 'Georgian Song' recreate marvellously the very atmosphere of the Orient." Mention must also be made in this connection of two collections of folk-songs made by Balakireff. One of thirty for piano duet, and one of forty with words for voice and piano. With those furnish material of priceless value for the of Rimsky-Korsakoff and Arensky they study of Russian folk-song.

Mrs Newmarch closes the article referred to above with a glimpse of the personal side of Balakireff that seems so in acordance with one's preconceived ideas s to need no apology for its quotation: "A year ago, I saw him in St. Petersburg. It was at the birthday celebration of one of his oldest friends, M. Valdimir Stassoff, a family gathering to which I had been invited with that genial, characteristically Russian omission of 'standing on ceremony.' Long before, when I had first begun to be interested in classic music, the personality and talent of Balakireff had attracted me especially. His was the spark of inspiration which had kindled not only a Russian musical conflagration, but even my far off individual enthusiasm. Naturally I was overjoyed at the prospect of seeing a personality so magnetic and at the same time so retiring. He was expected at nine o'clock; the piano was temptingly left open, like a trap set for a timid bird! From outward appearance, the piano seemed to act on Balakireff as the bait on the unfortunate sparrow,—it acted admirably. After greeting his host, he went immediately to the piano and announced his programme: 'I should like to play you three sonatas—Beethoven's "Appassionata," Chopin's in B minor and Schumann's in G minor. He started at once to play.

"Balakireff is not tall. I do not know his ancestry, but he is not at all of the tall, blond type of Northern Russia. He is more Oriental in physiognomy. His head is small, his complexion dark, his manner somewhat sober and dispirited, but his eyes are full of sympathy and fire—the true eyes of a seer and epic bard. As he took his seat at the piano I was inevitably reminded of my past impression of Von Bülow. There was something in his playing to confirm this resemblance. To be sure, Balakireff is not a dazzling virtuoso like Paderewski, but his technique is entirely adequate. Still, on hearing him play for the first time, the brilliancy of his performance is not the chief impression; neither does he carry all before him by the vitality of his emotion. A temperament so essentially enthusiastic, could not be cold, but yet he has not the emotional power or the profound poetry which were the master qualities of Rubinstein. The most striking trait of his art is his sympathetic, intellectual character. He observes, he analyzes, he teaches putting all in a clear light. His motto might be Stendahl's: 'To see clearly into realities.' Yet Balakireff could never be described as a dry pedagogue. If he is a teacher, he is thoroughly illumined, an inspired and congenial interpreter, who constructs the period and personality of a composer, instead of substituting his own views on the subject.

"On this evening after he had finished his arduous, self-imposed programme, I was ready to see him disappear as quietly as he had come. But my inspiration to say a few words to him in very bad Russian on the subject of his songs, and especially their accompaniments, kept him at the piano. He even went on talking, showing me some unusual rhythms in his songs, progressing insensibly into showing me similar curiosities in his piano compositions. He did not venture to try "Islamey," that favorite of Liszt's, but I remember a graceful and seductively rhythmical waltz.

"But the samovar was steaming on the table, and the odor of tea and citron, which is also seductive, spread through the room. Happily, Balakireff showed no indication of leaving. He came to the table with all the others and talked for a long time on music, principally of the master who dominated the first nationalist renaissance, Glinka. Russians like to prolong their hospitality [illegible] of the night. Balakireff was After it [illegible] the sky has a curious lurid pallor, that is neither twilight nor dawn. It was as if the ghost of the day haunted the night which had caused its death. My fantastic ideas seemed as strange and unreal as dreams. As I hastened through the empty streets I felt as if Balakireff were a magician who had carried me back to that decade after 1860, which was so full of faith and generous hopes—so fully did I seem to have taken part in the struggles and actual triumphs of the new Nationalist School of Russian music."

---

Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "Cleopatra," which the Symphony Orchestra played last season and which suggested rather a tour de force on the composer's part, stands on the programme of the Chicago Orchestra for its concerts of March 27 and 28.

For the six Symphony Concerts that remain after those of this week, Dr. Muck still has new music in reserve—notably a symphony by young Mr. Hadley and pieces by Ertel, one of the rising German composers, and the Norwegian, Halvorssen. Already the management of the orchestra is considering pianists and violinists for the concerts next year—notably Mischa Elman, the violinist who comes for the first time to America, and Emil Sauer, the pianist, who returns after long absence.

The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION!

TROY, N. Y. THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 7, 1901. 12 CENTS PER WEEK

BURDICK MURDER
Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day.
FOLLOWING CLEWS.

THE POPE ILL.
Symptoms of Bronchitis Appear.
DEFERS AUDIENCES.

EXTRA SESSI
Senate Meets on President's Call.
MANY NEW MEMBE

Troy, N. Y., March 14, 1908

—Trojan music lovers, and particularly those who attended the recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will read the following with interest: "Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of the greatest catholicity of taste in music and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as Director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsic, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programs is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors."

[illegible] PHILADELPHIA PA
Mar 9 - 1908

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 16. This will also be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck in this city. The program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; MacDowell's Indian suite, and Rimsky's Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish airs.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
PHILADELPHIA PA
MAR 5 - 1908

attack of grip.

Music.

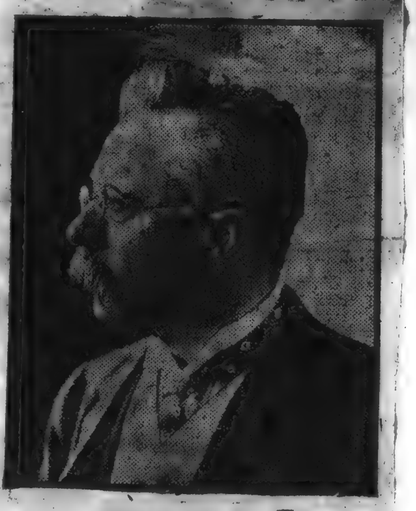
It was announced at Boston that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, would succeed Dr. Karl Muck as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] NEW YORK CITY
MAR 5 - 1908

Fiedler nach Boston.

Ist zum Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchesters, als Nachfolger von Dr. Karl Muck, gewählt worden.

Boston, Mass., 5. März. Die Leitung des Boston Symphony Orchesters machte heute bekannt, daß Herr Max



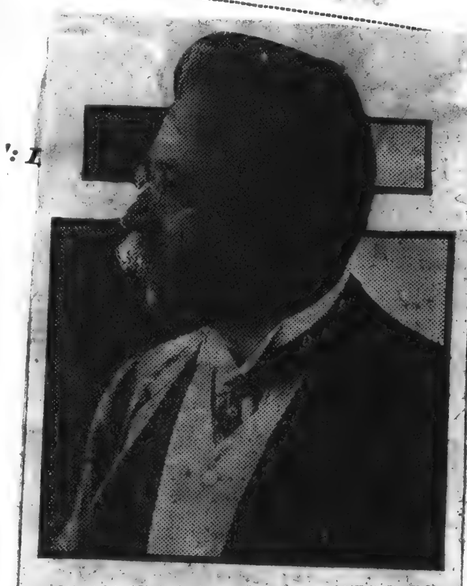
Max Fiedler.

Fiedler von Hamburg zum Dirigenten des Orchesters gewählt sei. Der bisherige Dirigent, Dr. Karl Muck, hatte vor einiger Zeit seine Resignation eingereicht, da er gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren. Fiedler wird die Leitung des Orchesters in nächster Saison übernehmen.

Der neuerwählte Dirigent ist den amerikanischen Musikfreunden kein Fremder mehr. Er hat bereits früher Reisen durch die Vereinigten Staaten gemacht und hier in New York ein Philharmonie Konzert dirigirt, bei dem er einen großen Erfolg erzielte und sich als ein autoritativer Leiter, der sein Orchester fest in der Hand hat, erwies.

Max Fiedler ist gegenwärtig der Dirigent der Philharmonischen Konzerte und Direktor des Konservatoriums in Hamburg. Er wurde am 31. Dezember 1859 in Zittau geboren. In Petersburg ist er seit mehreren Saisons Konzert-Dirigent der Kaiserlich russischen musikalischen Gesellschaft gewesen.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.
MAR 5 - 1908



MAX FIEDLER.

He will succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE NEW BOSTON CONDUCTOR

ACCORDING to the morning despatches, neither Willem Mengelberg, Arthur Nikisch, Felix Mottl, Henry Wood, nor a young and unknown conductor is to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the conclusion of the present season, but one Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Herr Fiedler was born in 1859. He was a pianist before he became a conductor. In 1882 he joined the faculty of the Hamburg Conservatory. Eventually he became conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra. In New York he is not unknown. In December, 1905, he conducted a pair of concerts for the Philharmonic Society of New York during the last season of the guest conductor period of that organization. The orchestral pieces on his programme were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Mme Gadski sang two arias. It was a conventional concert, a contrast to the concerts of Dr. Muck. Herr Fiedler acquitted himself as a safe and sane conductor. More recently he has conducted orchestral concerts in London with praise. He is said to have been recommended for the post in Boston by Dr. Muck.

[illegible] NEW YORK CITY
MAR 5 - 1908

Max Fiedler Neuer Bostoner Symphoniker.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester wählte als Nachfolger des im nächsten Jahre scheidenden Dr. Karl Muck Herrn Max Friedler aus Hamburg. Friedler ist hier kein Unbekannter mehr. Er leitete im Jahre 1905 zwei Konzerte der New Yorker Philharmoniker. Er studirte mit Dr. Muck zusammen auf dem Leipziger Konservatorium und machte sich in Deutschland als Vorkämpfer der modernen Franzosen einen Namen.

[illegible] VOGUE.
NEW YORK
MAR 5 - 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

THat greatest of all American symphony orchestras, the Boston, gave two concerts at Carnegie Hall week before last and again showed superlative playing qualities under the leadership of Dr. Muck. Such unanimity of attack, such beauty of tone quality rarely is heard anywhere in the world. It was like one great, splendid instrument which was being played upon by one man and the dynamic must have been a revelation to those who have not attended these concerts regularly.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date MAR 5 1908

Max Fiedler, who is announced as the successor to Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, is remembered in New York as having conducted one pair of the Philharmonic concerts under the "guest" regime which resulted in securing Safonoff here. He is a German of the older school, having made his studies in the Leipsic conservatory.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date MAR 5 1908

— Obwohl er dazu berufen wurde, den Taktstock zu schwingen, dürfte Herr Fiedler aus Hamburg zukünftig die erste Geige im Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester spielen.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date 30

Max Fiedler of Hamburg was announced to-day as Karl Muck's successor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Herr Fiedler is 49 years old. He came to New York as one of the Philharmonic "prima donna" conductors two years ago.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 7 - 1908

There is much interest in Baltimore in the selection of Max Fiedler of Hamburg as next season's conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is known in America by his compositions and through a visit in December, 1905, to conduct two concerts for the New York Philharmonic Society. His compositions include a symphony in D minor, which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintette for piano and strings, a string quartette, songs, piano pieces, etc. When he visited New York his programme was as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Strauss' "Don Juan," and Beethoven's symphony in C minor. Mr. Fiedler's distinguishing characteristic as a conductor is said to be [illegible] power of suggestion, which he exercises [illegible] in the orchestra.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 5 1908

FIEDLER FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Director To Succeed Dr. Muck Comes From Hamburg.

Boston, March 4.—It was announced tonight by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of [illegible] has been engaged as director of the [illegible] to succeed Dr. Karl Muck [illegible] composer for the piano, Balakirew has produced a long list of pieces. They show an individual and grateful piano style, harmonic originality and refinement, and much grace of personality. Some of them are written in a virtuoso idiom which is a bar to popularity, others full of charm and poetry belong in the category of salon music, although of an elevated order. He has also made brilliant and effective transcriptions, a Spanish melody by Glinka, arrangements of the same author's "Jota Aragonese" and "Komarinskaja," and a song, "The Lark," which has figured to some extent on concert programmes. There is also a brilliant fantasy on themes from Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Tsar." Stimulating and interesting as these pieces are, it has remained for the Russian Orient again to arouse Balakireff to his most individual achievement in piano music, the Oriental fantasy "Islamey" on Georgian themes. Here is a work absolutely sui generis in the whole range of piano literature. Of gorgeous and exotic imagination, with a wholly novel piano style that in some respects eclipses even the brilliant idiom of Liszt, in its emotional contrasts, skilful and unusual modulations and spontaneous treatment it displays a genius which Balakireff has never equalled in all his writings for piano. Liszt was devoted to the piece, and lost no chance to make it known. It has been played in Boston by MacDowell, Siloti, Carlo Buonamici, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann and doubtless by others.

[164]

Balakireff's songs, of which he has published no less than forty, are virtually unknown in this country at least, although to some they constitute an important portion of his creative work. Mrs. Newmarch in an article on Balakireff has this to say about them: "A series of songs published between 1858 and 1860 attest the rare qualities of a master jeweller. They are indeed little gems, cut in numberless facets, of which each reflects an exquisite and subtle emotion. The accompaniments to these songs resemble the setting of a jewel,—they are independent, but they enhance, they complete the musical thought which glistens at the centre. Such are, for example, the songs 'When Thy Beloved Voice I Hear,' 'Come to Me,' 'Lead Me, O Night,' 'Ecstasy,' 'The Song of the Golden Fish,' 'The Song of Selim' and a 'Georgian Song' recreate marvellously the very atmosphere of the Orient." Mention must also be made in this connection of two collections of folk-songs made by Balakireff. One of thirty for piano duet, and one of forty with words for voice and piano. With those furnish material of priceless value for the of Rimsky-Korsakoff and Arensky they study of Russian folk-song.

Mrs Newmarch closes the article referred to above with a glimpse of the personal side of Balakireff that seems so in acordance with one's preconceived ideas s to need no apology for its quotation: "A year ago, I saw him in St. Petersburg. It was at the birthday celebration of one of his oldest friends, M. Valdimir Stassoff, a family gathering to which I had been invited with that genial, characteristically Russian omission of 'standing on ceremony.' Long before, when I had first begun to be interested in classic music, the personality and talent of Balakireff had attracted me especially. His was the spark of inspiration which had kindled not only a Russian musical conflagration, but even my far off individual enthusiasm. Naturally I was overjoyed at the prospect of seeing a personality so magnetic and at the same time so retiring. He was expected at nine o'clock; the piano was temptingly left open, like a trap set for a timid bird! From outward appearance, the piano seemed to act on Balakireff as the bait on the unfortunate sparrow,—it acted admirably. After greeting his host, he went immediately to the piano and announced his programme: 'I should like to play you three sonatas—Beethoven's "Appassionata," Chopin's in B minor and Schumann's in G minor. He started at once to play.

"Balakireff is not tall. I do not know his ancestry, but he is not at all of the tall, blond type of Northern Russia. He is more Oriental in physiognomy. His head is small, his complexion dark, his manner somewhat sober and dispirited, but his eyes are full of sympathy and fire—the true eyes of a seer and epic bard. As he took his seat at the piano I was inevitably reminded of my past impression of Von Bülow. There was something in his playing to confirm this resemblance. To be sure, Balakireff is not a dazzling virtuoso like Paderewski, but his technique is entirely adequate. Still, on hearing him play for the first time, the brilliancy of his performance is not the chief impression; neither does he carry all before him by the vitality of his emotion. A temperament so essentially enthusiastic, could not be cold, but yet he has not the emotional power or the profound poetry which were the master qualities of Rubinstein. The most striking trait of his art is his sympathetic, intellectual character. He observes, he analyzes, he teaches putting all in a clear light. His motto might be Stendahl's: 'To see clearly into realities.' Yet Balakireff could never be described as a dry pedagogue. If he is a teacher, he is thoroughly illumined, an inspired and congenial interpreter, who constructs the period and personality of a composer, instead of substituting his own views on the subject.

"On this evening after he had finished his arduous, self-imposed programme, I was ready to see him disappear as quietly as he had come. But my inspiration to say a few words to him in very bad Russian on the subject of his songs, and especially their accompaniments, kept him at the piano. He even went on talking, showing me some unusual rhythms in his songs, progressing insensibly into showing me similar curiosities in his piano compositions. He did not venture to try "Islamey," that favorite of Liszt's, but I remember a graceful and seductively rhythmical waltz.

"But the samovar was steaming on the table, and the odor of tea and citron, which is also seductive, spread through the room. Happily, Balakireff showed no indication of leaving. He came to the table with all the others and talked for a long time on music, principally of the master who dominated the first nationalist renaissance, Glinka. Russians like to prolong their hospitality till late hours of the night; Balakireff was the first to excuse himself, because he had ing.

"In the month of May the nights at St. Petersburg are misty and uncertain as hallucinations. After midnight the sky has a curious lurid pallor, that is neither twilight nor dawn. It was as if the ghost of the day haunted the night which had caused its death. My fantastic ideas seemed as strange and unreal as dreams. As I hastened through the empty streets I felt as if Balakireff were a magician who had carried me back to that decade after 1860, which was so full of faith and generous hopes—so fully did I seem to have taken part in the struggles and actual triumphs of the new Nationalist School of Russian music."

Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "Cleopatra," which the Symphony Orchestra played last season and which suggested rather a tour de force on the composer's part, stands on the programme of the Chicago Orchestra for its concerts of March 27 and 28.

For the six Symphony Concerts that remain after those of this week, Dr. Muck still has new music in reserve—notably a symphony by young Mr. Hadley and pieces by Ertel, one of the rising German composers, and the Norwegian, Halvorssen. Already the management of the orchestra is considering pianists and violinists for the concerts next year—notably Mischa Elman, the violinist who comes for the first time to America, and Emil Sauer, the pianist, who returns after long absence.

The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION

BORDER MURDER — Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day — FOLLOWING CLUES

THE POPE ILL — Symptoms of Bron chitis Appear. — DEFERS AUDIENCES

EXTRA SESSION — Senate Enters on Executive Call — MANY NEW MEMBERS

Troy, N. Y., March 14, 1908

—Trojan music lovers, and particularly those who attended the recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will read the following with interest: "Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of the greatest catholicity of taste in music and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as Director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsic, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programs is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors."

om .....

dress .....

te .....

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 16. This will also be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck in this city. The program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; MacDowell's Indian suite, and Rimsky's Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish airs.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

s .....

attack of grip.

Music.

It was announced at Boston that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, would succeed Dr. Karl Muck as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

1908

Fiedler nach Boston.

Ist zum Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchesters, als Nachfolger von Dr. Karl Muck, gewählt worden.

Boston, Mass., 5. März. Die Leitung des Boston Symphony Orchesters machte heute bekannt, daß Herr Max

Max Fiedler.

Fiedler von Hamburg zum Dirigenten des Orchesters gewählt sei. Der bisherige Dirigent, Dr. Karl Muck, hatte vor einiger Zeit seine Resignation eingereicht, da er gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren. Fiedler wird die Leitung des Orchesters in nächster Saison übernehmen.

Der neuerwählte Dirigent ist den amerikanischen Musikfreunden kein Fremder mehr. Er hat bereits früher Reisen durch die Vereinigten Staaten gemacht und hier in New York ein Philharmonie Konzert dirigirt, bei dem er einen großen Erfolg erzielte und sich als ein autoritativer Leiter, der sein Orchester fest in der Hand hat, erwies.

Max Fiedler ist gegenwärtig der Dirigent der Philharmonischen Konzerte und Direktor des Konservatoriums in Hamburg. Er wurde am 31. Dezember 1859 in Zittau geboren. In Petersburg ist er seit mehreren Saisons Konzert-Dirigent der Kaiserlich russischen musikalischen Gesellschaft gewesen.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

MAX FIEDLER.

He will succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE NEW BOSTON CONDUCTOR

ACCORDING to the morning despatches, neither Willem Mengelberg, Arthur Nikisch, Felix Mottl, Henry Wood, nor a young and unknown conductor is to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the conclusion of the present season, but one Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Herr Fiedler was born in 1859. He was a pianist before he became a conductor. In 1882 he joined the faculty of the Hamburg Conservatory. Eventually he became conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra. In New York he is not unknown. In December, 1905, he conducted a pair of concerts for the Philharmonic Society of New York during the last season of the guest conductor period of that organization. The orchestral pieces on his programme were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Mme Gadski sang two arias. It was a conventional concert, a contrast to the concerts of Dr. Muck. Herr Fiedler acquitted himself as a safe and sane conductor. More recently he has conducted orchestral concerts in London with praise. He is said to have been recommended for the post in Boston by Dr. Muck.

[164]

ss .....

.....

Max Fiedler Muck's Nachfolger.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester wählte als Nachfolger des im nächsten Jahre scheidenden Dr. Karl Muck Herrn Max Friedler aus Hamburg. Friedler ist hier kein Unbekannter mehr. Er leitete im Jahre 1905 zwei Konzerte der New Yorker Philharmoniker. Er studirte mit Dr. Muck zusammen auf dem Leipziger Konservatorium und machte sich in Deutschland als Vorkämpfer der modernen Franzosen einen Namen.

m .....

lress .....

te .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

THat greatest of all American symphony orchestras, the Boston, gave two concerts at Carnegie Hall week before last and again showed superlative playing qualities under the leadership of Dr. Muck. Such unanimity of attack, such beauty of tone quality rarely is heard anywhere in the world. It was like one great, splendid instrument which was being played upon by one man and the dynamic must have been a revelation to those who have not attended these concerts regularly.

rom EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 5 1908

Max Fiedler, who is announced as the successor to Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, is remembered in New York as having conducted one pair of the Philharmonic concerts under the "guest" regime which resulted in securing Safonoff here. He is a German of the older school, having made his studies in the Leipsic conservatory.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

rom STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date .....

— Obwohl er dazu berufen wurde, den Taktstock zu schwingen, dürfte Herr Fiedler aus Hamburg zukünftig die erste Geige im Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester spielen.

m EVENING SUN,

lress New York City.

te .....

Max Fiedler of Hamburg was announced to-day as Karl Muck's successor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Herr Fiedler is 49 years old. He came to New York as one of the Philharmonic "prima donna" conductors two years ago.

utting Bureau in the World

There is much interest in Baltimore in the selection of Max Fiedler of Hamburg as next season's conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is known in America by his compositions and through a visit in December, 1905, to conduct two concerts for the New York Philharmonic Society. His compositions include a symphony in D minor which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintette for piano and strings, a string quartette, songs, piano pieces, etc. When he visited New York his programme was as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Strauss' "Don Juan," and Beethoven's symphony in C minor. Mr. Fiedler's distinguishing characteristic as a conductor is said to be his power of suggestion, which he exercises quietly on the orchestra

1908

FIEDLER FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Director To Succeed Dr. Muck Comes From Hamburg.

Boston, March 4.—It was announced tonight by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to secure a further leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge at the opening

...per Cutting Bureau of the World
COURIER.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
MAR 8- 1908

...the fifteen symphony programmes ...have been played in Boston by ... Boston Symphony Orchestra this ...er Dr. Muck has presented a total ...mber of eighteen works which are ... to Boston, and a majority of ...have had their first hearing in ... In the next four pro... are seven more novelties ...these twenty-five works have not ...usted the list prepared for the ..., for in the last concerts one or ...important novelties will be played. ...works new to Boston which Dr. ... has placed on his programme ...so far are Vincent d'Indy's ...tein Trilogy," Pfitzner's over... to "The Little Christ-Elf," Loef...'s "A Pagan Poem," Rdznicek's ...gio and scherzo-finale from his ...ie in E minor, Ernst Boehe's sym...onic poem, "Taormina," Humper...k's overture, "The Forced Mar...," D'Ambrosio's concerto for violin ...B minor; Bossi's "Intermezzi Gold...ani," Rheinberger's concerto in F ...or organ, three horns and strings; ...anck's symphonic piece, "The Re...mption," Bischoff's symphony in E ...ajor, three German dances by Mo..., Schelling's fantastic suite for ...lano and orchestra, Chadwick's ...mphonic Sketches," Reger's vari...s and fugue on a merry theme of ...A. Hiller, Schelderup's "Summer ...ight on a Fjord" and "Sunrise Over ...e Himalayas," and Rimsky-Korsa...f's caprice on Spanish themes. In ...e next four concerts he will present ...hanyi's concert piece for orchestra ...th 'cello obligato, Converse's ...Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for ...rchestra, Hinton's concerto for piano, ...alakireff's symphony in C major; ...alvorsen's "Fossegrimen," suite for ...rchestra, and two pieces for orchestra ...with viola obligato by Gustav Strube. ...The Bischoff symphony and Loeffler's ...A Pagan Poem," are both repeated.

...rom ...NEWS
...ddress ...BUFFALO, N. Y.
...ate ...

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concertmaster and a new second concert-master in place of Mr. Carl Wendling and Mr. Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the ...

...NEWS
...BUFFALO, N. Y.
...MAR 8- 1908

Dr. Muck has arranged a program solely of compositions by American writers for the last concert given by the Boston Symphony in New York under his direction. The works to be played are as follows: A Pagan Poem, by Loeffler; Indian Suite, by MacDowell; Suite from music to Jeanne d'Arc, by Converse.

It has been announced by the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra that a successor to Dr. Muck has been appointed in the person of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler will assume direction of the orchestra at the beginning of next season.

COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
MAR 6- 1908

It is announced by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as conductor of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to obtain a longer leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season. Mr. Fiedler is known in New York, although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1903, and made a success. Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler were fellow students in the Leipzig Conservatory. Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859, and has devoted his life to music. He was a leading pianist in Germany before he became a conductor.

TIMES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 10 1908

Dr. Karl Muck's farewell American appearance will be witnessed when he appears at the National Theater [illegible] afternoon, March 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Immediately after he will leave for Berlin to become conductor of the Royal Opera.

...Cutting Bureau of the World
STAR,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 8 1908

Dr. Karl Muck's farewell American appearance will be at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Immediately after he will leave for Berlin to become conductor of the Royal Opera.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 8 1908

The last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30. This will be the farewell appearance of Dr. Karl Muck.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" Repeated, a New Symphony by Balakireff and a Clanging Overture by Chabrier — A Varied Field, in Which Mr. Loeffler Was Clearly the Master—Balakireff's Conventional Russian Music, and Chabrier's Undeserved Plight

Mr. Loeffler almost had the afternoon to himself at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, less because the audience listened very intently to the repetition of his "Pagan Poem" and applauded him very warmly at the end, than because his music dimmed the glow of Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" that followed, and in recollection made the preceding symphony by Balakireff seem in comparison rather a poor and common thing. It is four years since the striding, clanging overture—al passionate rhythms and passionate sonorities—to Chabrier's viking opera has been played in Boston, and memory leapt to welcome it. Good to hear again would be the languorous music of the on-rushing Danes and the four-square chant of Walhalla in the resounding finale. In itself, there is not a reason why the music should have lost for the moment its fire of passionate imagination, its splendor of passionate utterance. Chabrier's thrilling vitality easily survives the years. By it and by the power of rhythm in which he gives it play, he lives and will live long. The overture to "Gwendoline" needs no atmosphere of the theatre and no aid from the rising curtain and the succeeding play. As music it speaks for itself, and Dr. Muck, as always in an operatic overture, made it speak eloquently.

And yet merely because Chabrier's overture happened to follow Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem it sounded strangely tame and a little empty. The glowing sonorities had momentarily lost their power after the finer intensities of Mr. Loeffler's music. A passion of rhythmic energy and imagination like Chabrier's seemed rather a poor thing after the wider-ranging expressiveness in melodic idea, in harmony, in instrumental coloring, in the full resource of music that stirred in Mr. Loeffler. The overture to "Gwendoline" seemed rhetorical and "effective" in the meaner sense of the word after the sensitiveness and the subtler yet not less potent imaginings of "A Pagan Poem." Chabrier was of the temperament that must take thought of its audience, even when he wrought in such fire of spirit as that in which seemingly he wrote his "little Gwendoline." Mr. Loeffler's idea and purpose and all that they suggested to him had seemingly driven all else from his imagination. Long as he worked upon "A Pagan Poem," often as he transformed it, it still sounds spontaneous and inevitable to its theme.

And in retrospect, Mr. Loeffler's music no less dimmed Balakireff's. Mr. Loeffler's is a familiar name on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. Balakireff's stood there for the first time. Yet, at every turn, "A Pagan Poem" seemed new, fresh, individual and original, to lead, to command, and to absorb the listener. The symphony in C major, on the other hand, was precisely what the same listener had reason to expect in new music by a new Russian. By chance or by design the lesser Russian composers with their loud disdain of the non-Slav world outside, have shut themselves in a little world of their own where they and seemingly all things musical run in the same mould. Balakireff is alert, fanciful, spontaneous in the instrumental dress that he gives his symphony. Easily he gains the bizarre and the unsuspected. He can write a highly fantastic and light-footed scherzo, with a becomingly songful middle passage. His slow movement runs in brooding and melancholy song. He knows his Russian folk-tunes, and he can make them whirl in riotous rhythm and sonority, or set them more quietly to singing themselves through varied instrumental voices. He has heard, and he uses, strumming Oriental rhythms and languid Oriental song. But he cannot develop, elaborate and vary his melodies and draw new musical and poetic suggestion from them. On goes his symphony, changeful is its instrumental raiment and decoration. There he is fertile and fanciful enough, but fecund imagination deserts him with his melodies. They are rather poor little melodies; they lead no whither; imaginative zest is not in them; body they have not. And so to traverse the traits of Balakireff's symphony is to traverse scarcely less the traits of many a Russian symphony of the [illegible]

...olo... ...ive folk-Slav cr... ...well in the sophisticated ... ...ated Old World. Balakirev has written a mildly amusing little symphony à la Russe and no more.

Moreover, in spite of the assertions of their partisans, it is not the virtue of these "nationalists," these primitives, these apostles of folk-tunes, to write music of poignant and compelling human quality and voice. Far oftener, as it seems, the men who keep to the good old prescription in the arts and look in their hearts and write, achieve the expressiveness, the emotional force, the poetic suggestion that the others may not compass. Mr. Loeffler's music in "A Pagan Poem" or anywhere else, bears no mark of nationality. It courts no real or assumed simplicity. It finds its inspiration in the composer's own mind and heart. It needs no spur but the purpose that has possessed him. Grant that Balakireff was writing absolute music in his symphony, while Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem has the literary, the poetic and the emotional suggestion of the chosen fragment of Virgil's eclogue behind. Yet "A Pagan Poem" is no whit less symphonic than the Russian music; rather it is many fold more so in the development, the modulation, the contrasts and the combinations of its melodies. Put Virgil's verse aside and listen to "A Pagan Poem" as so much absolute music, independent of all things but itself. Then recall Balakireff's thin, monotonous, and laboring little symphony, and the advantage in expressive, emotional, human, and poetic quality, is all on Mr. Loeffler's side. The listener need not know the longing and the elation of Virgil's girl, the sorceress spells, the haunting refrain, to feel the passionate intensity, the human significance, the imaginative suggestion of Mr. Loeffler's music.

Moreover in this particular case such comparisons are intrinsically futile. Balakireff's symphony will go and come in the plenteous tides of new and of Russian music Dr. Muck, as it his duty to do, has informed his audiences of it sympathetically and left them to keep what impressions they will. "A Pagan Poem" remains, the ablest achievement, thus far, of one of the most truly eminent and truly distinguished composers of our time. Nowhere, in all his music, has Mr. Loeffler written with more resourceful, imaginative and significant command of his medium. Nowhere has he filled so large a canvas so completely and so vividly. Nowhere has he written music of such intensity of mood and such passion alike of frank utterance and of subtler suggestion. In "A Pagan Poem" he has gained a new largeness, substance, warmth and humanity of imagination and expression. Mr. Loeffler is the poet still who writes in tones and makes them serve and heighten his poetic purpose, but he is such a poet with a wider, deeper, and more stirring eloquence. Virgil's girl is nearly 2000 years old. Rollinat, Maeterlinck, and the rest of Mr. Loeffler's Frenchmen count barely their half-century. But it is she, not they,

Standard Union.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 15 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Goricke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipzig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the symphony concerts, if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

[165]

Eighteenth Concert of the Symphony Season.

Grand Opera Prospects Very Bright at the Boston.

Recitals of the Week by Artists of Note.

Dr. Muck opened the 18th symphony program with an unfamiliar work, the C major symphony by the Russian Balakireff, one of the new school of composers. Although a prolific writer, he is not very well known in this country, his minor pieces, orchestral and vocal, being about all the representation he has had until recently. This symphony, which is his only work of this class, is in four movements, and though strongly national in many points is not violently so. There are fewer moments of prolonged dissonants here than are usual in the "new school" productions; but in art of orchestral juggling he is evidently not a whit behind his contemporary Slavs, who labor in the musical field.

In the opening movement Balakireff supplies a wealth of thematic material, so episodic and ephemeral in treatment that, aside from some modulations and characteristic fortissimo passages, there is little in it to suggest the influence of Russian irspiration.

The second part, based upon a quaint waltz theme scored in a strikingly complicated manner, is largely given over to a kind of loitering orchestration; an echo as it were of the melody that has just been voiced. The effect is admirably worked out in various combinations, and against these there is a slumbering string accompaniment that is extremely elaborate and difficult. The ending is odd and unexpected in character. In this movement the string bands deserve special mention, for upon their good work depended most of the satisfactory results attending this scherzo.

The andante and finale are really compiled in one movement. In the first the changing tonalities, short phrases and elusive lights and shades displayed the skill and originality of the composer to be of the highest grade, and it also showed the abilities of the wood-winds to successfully cope with the musical difficulties set before them. After some brilliant passages for the harp the strenuously accented finale is reached. Here the heavier strings fall into line, soon giving way to the other instruments that meander through a perfect sea of thematic bits that die away one after the other midst intermittent fortissimo suggestions, Slavic and not always melodic.

The wealth of orchestral color and all the sterner qualities of this immensely complicated work were lucidly set forth, every movement being made impressive, though there was much fuss and fury, which to some ears have little or no musical importance. And although so-called Russian music suggests trumpets and horns ad lib to many people, in this case Mr Loeffler has in his "Pagan Poem" utilized the brass contingents with more thrilling effect than Balakireff did in his symphony.

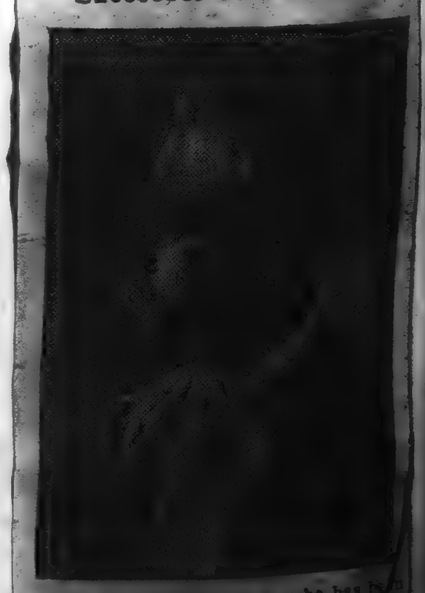
Mr Loeffer's poem, the second number on the program, did not suffer by proximity to the larger work. The work is worthy to be repeated and another hearing shows that it is a good solid composition, interesting, scholarly in ideas and handling. The performance was fine in every way and Mr Gebhard repeated his excellent work at the piano. The concert closed with the "Gwendoline" overture by Chabrier.

The vigor of the performance brought out vividly the barbaric and tumultuous features of a work that fairly rival in this respect similar episodes in the other two program numbers.

The fifth tour will keep the orchestra away from Boston this week. The 19th program, March 27 and 28, will begin with a suite for orchestra by Halvorsen, first time at these concerts. Two symphonic poems for orchestra with viola solo by Gustav Strube and Beethoven's first symphony complets the selections.

NEWS
LYNN, MASS.
MAR 10 1908

Successor To Dr. Muck



Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been selected to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

spe r Cutting Bureau of the World

COURIER.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

In the fifteen symphony programmes that have been played in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year Dr. Muck has presented a total number of eighteen works which are new to Boston, and a majority of them have had their first hearing in America. In the next four programmes are seven more novelties and these twenty-five works have not exhausted the list prepared for the season, for in the last concerts one or two important novelties will be played. The works new to Boston which Dr. Muck has placed on his programme this year so far are Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," Pfitzner's overture to "The Little Christ-Elf," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," Rdznicek's adagio and scherzo-finale from his suite in E minor, Ernst Boehe's symphonic poem, "Taormina," Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage," D'Ambrosio's concerto for violin in B minor, Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," Rheinberger's concerto in F for organ, three horns and strings; Franck's symphonic piece, "The Redemption," Bischoff's symphony in E major, three German dances by Mozart, Schelling's fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme of J. A. Hiller, Schelderup's "Summer Night on a Fjord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes. In the next four concerts he will present Dohnanyi's concert piece for orchestra with 'cello obligato, Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, Hinton's concerto for piano, Balakireff's symphony in C major; Halvorsen's "Fossegrimen," suite for orchestra, and two pieces for orchestra with viola obligato by Gustav Strube. The Bischoff symphony and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" are both repeated.

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert-master and a new second concert-master in place of Mr. Carl Wendling and Mr. Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

ss .....

Dr. Muck has arranged a program solely of compositions by American writers for the last concert given by the Boston Symphony in New York under his direction. The works to be played are as follows: A Pagan Poem, by Loeffler; Indian Suite, by MacDowell; Suite from music to Jeanne d'Arc, by Converse.

It has been announced by the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra that a successor to Dr. Muck has been appointed in the person of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler will assume direction of the orchestra at the beginning of next season.

It is announced by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been engaged as director of the orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who has been unable to obtain a longer leave of absence from Berlin. Mr. Fiedler will assume charge of the orchestra at the opening of next season. Mr. Fiedler is known in New York, although his work is little known outside of Germany. He conducted concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905, and made a success. Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler were fellow students in the Leipsig Conservatory. Mr. Fiedler was born at Zittau in 1859, and has devoted his life to music. He was a leading pianist in Germany before he became a conductor.

TIMES,

Dr. Karl Muck's farewell American appearance will be witnessed when he appears at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He leaves for Berlin the last week in March to become conductor of the Royal Opera.

utting Bureau in the World

AR,

.08

Dr. Karl Muck's farewell American appearance will be at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Immediately after he will leave for Berlin to become conductor of the Royal Opera.

ss .....

The last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30. This will be the farewell appearance of Dr. Karl Muck.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" Repeated, a New Symphony by Balakireff and a Clanging Overture by Chabrier — A Varied Field, in Which Mr. Loeffler Was Clearly the Master—Balakireff's Conventional Russian Music, and Chabrier's Undeserved Plight

Mr. Loeffler almost had the afternoon to himself at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, less because the audience listened very intently to the repetition of his "Pagan Poem" and applauded him very warmly at the end, than because his music dimmed the glow of Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" that folowed, and in recollection made the preceding symphony by Balakireff seem in comparison rather a poor and common thing. It is four years since the striding, clanging overture—al passionate rhythms and passionate sonorities—to Chabrier's viking opera has been played in Boston, and memory leapt to welcome it. Good to hear again would be the languorous music of the on-rushing Danes and the four-square chant of Walhalla in the resounding finale. In itself, there is not a reason why the music should have lost for the moment its fire of passionate imagination, its splendor of passionate utterance. Chabrier's thrilling vitality easily survives the years. By it and by the power of rhythm in which he gives it play, he lives and will live long. The overture to "Gwendoline" needs no atmosphere of the theatre and no aid from the rising curtain and the succeeding play. As music it speaks for itself, and Dr. Muck, as always in an operatic overture, made it speak eloquently.

And yet merely because Chabrier's overture happened to follow Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem it sounded strangely tame and a little empty. The glowing sonorities had momentarily lost their power after the finer intensities of Mr. Loeffler's music. A passion of rhythmic energy and imagination like Chabrier's seemed rather a poor thing after the wider-ranging expressiveness in melodic idea, in harmony, in instrumental coloring, in the full resource of music that stirred in Mr. Leoffler. The overture to "Gwendoline" seemed rhetorical and "effective" in the meaner sense of the word after the sensitiveness and the subtler yet not less potent imaginings of "A Pagan Poem." Chabrier was of the temperament that must take thought of its audience, even when he wrought in such fire of spirit as that in which seemingly he wrote his "little Gwendoline." 'Mr. Loeffler's idea and purpose and all that they suggested to him had seemingly driven all else from his imagination. Long as he worked upon "A Pagan Poem," often as he transformed it, it still sounds spontaneous and inevitable to its theme.

And in retrospect, Mr. Loeffler's music no less dimmed Balakireff's. Mr. Loeffler's is a familiar name on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. Balakireff's stood there for the first time. Yet, at every turn, "A Pagan Poem" seemed new, fresh, individual and original, to lead, to command, and to absorb the listener. The symphony in C major, on the other hand, was precisely what the same listener had reason to expect in new music by a new Russian. By chance or by design the lesser Russian composers with their loud disdain of the non-Slav world outside, have shut themselves in a little world of their own where they and seemingly all things musical run in the same mould. Balakireff is alert, fanciful, spontaneous in the instrumental dress that he gives his symphony. Easily he gains the bizarre and the unsuspected. He can write a highly fantastic and light-footed scherzo, with a becomingly songful middle passage. His slow movement runs in brooding and melancholy song. He knows his Russian folk-tunes, and he can make them whirl in riotous rhythm and sonority, or set them more quietly to singing themselves through varied instrumental voices. He has heard, and he uses, strumming Oriental rhythms and languid Oriental song. But he cannot develop, elaborate and vary his melodies and draw new musical and poetic suggestion from them. On goes his symphony, changeful is its instrumental raiment and decoration. There he is fertile and fanciful enough, but fecund imagination deserts him with his melodies. They are rather poor little melodies; they lead no whither; imaginative zest is not in them; body they have not. And so to traverse the traits of Balakireff's symphony is to traverse scarcely less the traits of many a Russian symphony of the school that calls him father. We in Boston have heard such music before—Glazounoff's for example; we shall hear more of it again of monotony in all else than instrumental color and voice. Perhaps, after all, primitive folk, Slav or any other, wear none too well in the sophisticated arts of a sophisticated Old World. Balakireff has written a mildly amusing little symphony à la Russe, and no more.

Moreover, in spite of the assertions of their partisans, it is not the virtue of these "nationalists," these primitives, these apostles of folk-tunes, to write music of poignant and compelling human quality and voice. Far oftener, as it seems, the men who keep to the good old prescription in the arts and look in their hearts and write, achieve the expressiveness, the emotional force, the poetic suggestion that the others may not compass. Mr. Loeffler's music in "A Pagan Poem" or anywhere else, bears no mark of nationality. It courts no real or assumed simplicity. It finds its inspiration in the composer's own mind and heart. It needs no spur but the purpose that has possessed him. Grant that Balakireff was writing absolute music in his symphony, while Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem has the literary, the poetic and the emotional suggestion of the chosen fragment of Virgil's eclogue behind. Yet "A Pagan Poem" is no whit less symphonic than the Russian music; rather it is many fold more so in the development, the modulation, the contrasts and the combinations of its melodies. Put Virgil's verse aside and listen to "A Pagan Poem" as so much absolute music, independent of all things but itself. Then recall Balakireff's thin, monotonous, and laboring little symphony, and the advantage in expressive, emotional, human, and poetic quality, is all on Mr. Loeffler's side. The listener need not know the longing and the elation of Virgil's girl, the sorceress-spells, the haunting refrain, to feel the passionate intensity, the human significance, the imaginative suggestion of Mr. Loeffler's music.

Moreover in this particular case such comparisons are intrinsically futile. Balakireff's symphony will go and come in the plenteous tides of new and of Russian music Dr. Muck, as it his duty to do, has informed his audiences of it sympathetically and left them to keep what impressions they will. "A Pagan Poem" remains, the ablest achievement, thus far, of one of the most truly eminent and truly distinguished composers of our time. Nowhere, in all his music, has Mr. Loeffler written with more resourceful, imaginative and significant command of his medium. Nowhere has he filled so large a canvas so completely and so vividly. Nowhere has he written music of such intensity of mood and such passion alike of frank utterance and of subtler suggestion. In "A Pagan Poem" he has gained a new largeness, substance, warmth and humanity of imagination and expression. Mr. Loeffler is the poet still who writes in tones and makes them serve and heighten his poetic purpose, but he is such a poet with a wider, deeper, and more stirring eloquence. Virgil's girl is nearly 2000 years old. Rollinat, Maeterlinck, and the rest of Mr. Loeffler's Frenchmen count barely their half-century. But it is she, not they,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 15 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Goricke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipzig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the symphony concerts, if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

GLOBE, MARCH 15, 19

Eighteenth Concert of the Symphony Season.

Grand Opera Prospects Very Bright at the Boston.

Recitals of the Week by Artists of Note.

Dr Muck opened the 18th symphony program with an unfamiliar work, the C major symphony by the Russian Balakireff, one of the new school of composers. Although a prolific writer, he is not very well known in this country, his minor pieces, orchestral and vocal, being about all the representation he has had until recently. This symphony, which is his only work of this class, is in four movements, and though strongly national in many points is not violently so. There are fewer moments of prolonged dissonants here than are usual in the "new school" productions; but in art of orchestral juggling he is evidently not a whit behind his contemporary Slavs, who labor in the musical field.

In the opening movement Balakireff supplies a wealth of thematic material, so episodic and ephemeral in treatment that, aside from some modulations and characteristic fortissimo passages, there is little in it to suggest the influence of Russian inspiration.

The second part, based upon a quaint waltz theme scored in a strikingly complicated manner, is largely given over to a kind of loitering orchestration; an echo as it were of the melody that has just been voiced. The effect is admirably worked out in various combinations, and against these there is a slumbering string accompaniment that is extremely elaborate and difficult. The ending is odd and unexpected in character. In this movement the string bands deserve special mention, for upon their good work depended most of the satisfactory results attending this scherzo.

The andante and finale are really combined in one movement. In the first the changing tonalities, short phrases and elusive lights and shades displayed the skill and originality of the composer to be of the highest grade, and it also showed the abilities of the wood-winds to successfully cope with the musical difficulties set before them. After some brilliant passages for the harp the strenuously accented finale is reached. Here the heavier strings fall into line, soon giving way to the other instruments that meander through a perfect sea of thematic bits that die away one after the other midst intermittent fortissimo suggestions, Slavic and not always melodic.

The wealth of orchestral color and all the sterner qualities of this immensely complicated work were lucidly set forth, every movement being made impressive, though there was much fuss and fury, which to some ears have little or no musical importance. And although so-called Russian music suggests trumpets and horns ad lib to many people, in this case Mr Loeffler has in his "Pagan Poem" utilized the brass contingents with more thrilling effect than Balakireff did in his symphony.

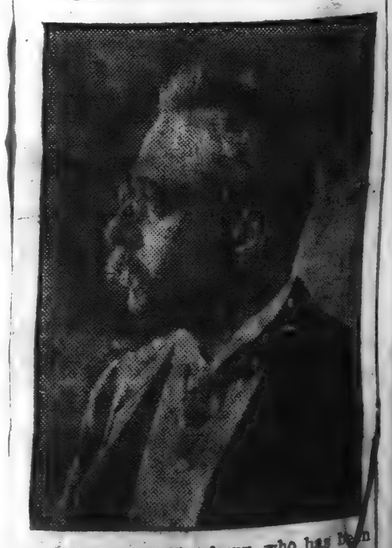
Mr Loeffler's poem, the second number on the program, did not suffer by proximity to the larger work. The work is worthy to be repeated and another hearing shows that it is a good solid composition, interesting, scholarly in ideas and handling. The performance was fine in every way and Mr Gebhard repeated his excellent work at the piano. The concert closed with the "Gwendoline" overture by Chabrier.

The vigor of the performance brought out vividly the barbaric and tumultuous features of a work that fairly rival in this respect similar episodes in the other two program numbers.

The fifth tour will keep the orchestra away from Boston this week. The 19th program, March 27 and 28, will begin with a suite for orchestra by Halvorsen, first time at these concerts. Two symphonic poems for orchestra with viola solo by Gustav Strube and Beethoven's first symphony complete the selections.

MAR 1

Successor To Dr. Muck



Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been selected to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

[165]

POST. MAR 08

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A symphony in C major by Mily Balakereff, who may in a sense be called the father of the modern school, was heard for the first time in this city at the Symphony public rehearsal and concert of Friday and Saturday. Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra and piano, which was given its initial performance earlier in the season, was repeated by general request and Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline" completed the programme. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, as before, played the piano part in the performance of the Pagan Poem.

Now Balikereff is a burning patriot, and a nationalist to the backbone. The hope of the aged Glinka, the first great Russian composer, his development proceeded along strictly national lines. His important works have almost invariably been based on folk-song. Did he not, by the use of three Russian tunes, respectively representative of "Paganism," "Cossack Democracy," and "Modern Russia," portray the past, present and future of his mighty land? The orchestral fantasie, "En Boheme," which was played for the first time in Boston at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert last January in Jordan Hall, was one crazy-quilt of Czech melodies, and these melodies were strung together to form a loose, shambling, hobbling affair that was all joints.

This symphony, which is very national in context, is a far more finished and mature effort than the piece just mentioned, though in the first movement and some measures of the andante there is a still evident lack of constructuve ability. A symphony that will live requires something more than a few themes thrown into a pot together and boiled according to recipe. Balikereff is enamoured of the curve and the momentum of his dear melodies, but to combine these melodies to realize them in a manner to build a strong, proportional tonal edifice seems not always within his capacity. In the opening portion of the work he has adhered too closely to the classic mould. So many bars filled with notes, many feet ruled and measured. As the movement progresses the composer gets more truly en rapport with his task, but this section is the least successful and characteristic of the four.

The work, however, as a whole, rings true. It is genuinely and unmistakably Russian, which is something that can too seldom be said of the effusions of the so-called "modern Russian school." The orchestral style is that of Berlioz, smeared with Russian grease. There is the exotic richness and depth of color, the sensuousness, the cloying curve of Oriental song. The voice of that clarinet in the slow movement might be heard brooding over the long reaches of the steppes in the palpitating, unfathomable summer night; the tunes of the finale, with their dance rhythms and melting sensuousness, are truly of Russia. To some this music may be antagonistic, perhaps vulgar, but I confess to great pleasure in the rhythms that clamor, the lush melodies that might easily pall, the crashing drums and cymbals, the unrefined pomp and bombast, the sonorous splurges of the brass.

To go a little more into detail, the scherzo, which has a strong, symphonic pulse, is fascinating in its material and the ingenuity with which that material is handled. The andante is a romanze at once passionate and elegiac, and most sumptuously scored. It leads directly into the finale, which is practically a rondo on themes of a very national character. The free rondo form, which does not require extended development in the sense that the "sonata form" of the first movement does, is very suitable as the vehicle of such fragmentary material, and the composer is correspondingly happy and resourceful in his writing. The symphony, in spite of lapses where it savors of the perfunctory or commonplace, is a vital and individual creation.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" has been rapturously hailed as his greatest composition, his most mature and human achievement. Statements of that sort cannot possibly be conclusive at a time when we are so close to works of unusual distinction and workmanship. That Mr. Loeffler has made a notable addition to a series of works of remarkable originality is beyond dispute. That he has never written with more consummate mastery seems probable, though this question also, to be authoritatively decided, would require the most intimate acquaintance with the works of the composer and a judge versed as few are in the art of composition.

To this writer, who cannot boast so close an acquaintance with these compositions as he would desire, the Pagan Poem, at the second hearing, had not the force, the irresistible fascination and conviction of either the "Death of Tintagiles" or the "Villanelle du Diable," to mention at random two earlier orchestral works. It seems in places to be a series of episodes and the thought to be often over-elaborated.

Again and again come wonderful and engrossing passages. It could not be otherwise with a composer possessed as Mr. Loeffler of so keen and individual sense of the beautiful. The opening pages, which certainly establish a mood, and the conclusion appear at present to be the strongest parts of the work. Wondrous, throughout, are the orchestral effects, wondrous the splendid, [illegible] often cold, tints of that gorgeous palette. How rare and precious those harmonies! One feels the composer smacking his lips over some finely delineative phrase or purple tone-color. Who treasures a new and subtle taste more than he? Could anything more beautiful than the solo for the English horn, or more strangely imaginative than the far-off call of the trumpets, an idea in itself a triumph, be conceived? The effect of the combined timbres of the two instruments at the entrance of the trumpets is beyond the power of words to describe.

At times the fantasy of the composer glows at a passionate, white heat; again it subsides into quieter but no less entrancing hues. Yet, with all this, ideas seem too often to be dallied with, picked up, juggled with the tremendous en- [illegible] until [illegible] possibilities of the music, as contrasted to what many consider the more remote former style of the composer, has been remarked upon. It is true that the music often flames with ardor, but it is the ardor of the intellect and the imagination, not of the flesh. In spite of such passages as those immediately preceding and following the last appearance of the trumpet motive Mr. Loeffler is still "un cerebral," a decadent, and so in all probability he will remain. One would not wish it otherwise, for we could not afford to lose a jot or tittle of his personality. Even the overwhelming jubilation at the end is the unmasterable exuberance of a brain and nerves always tuned to the highest pitch, and even it, to me, savors of irony and the macabre.

These are present impressions which may be altered tomorrow. No more interesting work has been heard this season; no work has more whetted curiosity. To hear it once was to ardently desire a second opportunity of so doing; to hear it twice is to have the desire for repeated hearings increased tenfold. It would be mightily interesting, now, to have an opportunity of comparing Mr. Loeffler's earlier works with this latest creation.

The performance was an exceptionally brilliant one. Mr. Gebhard, who is unsurpassed in this city as an ensemble player, excelled as he did at the first performance. At the conclusion of the piece the composer acknowledged warm and long-continued applause.

The overture to "Gwendoline" is often vulgar and melodramatic, if you will, and strongly tinctured with Wagner—what composer of Chabrier's period could well avoid being? These facts are unable to rob the music of its originality and exceeding dramatic force. It is superbly, perhaps here and there too heavily, instrumentated, and it blazed as a firebrand yesterday.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week. On the following Friday and Saturday two new compositions by Mr. Gustave Strube, the well-known composer and member of the [illegible]stra, will be played for the [illegible]

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Carl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera.

Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the municipal opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact that did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of 24 different programmes is not a simple task even when one has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston today has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which has been established and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

* * * *

NEW YORK HERALD,
BROOKLYN EDIT,
New York City.
[illegible]

MUCK AND LOEFFLER SHARE HONORS AT CONCERT

Composer of "Pagan Poem" Receives an Ovation at Saturday's Symphony Production, and Conductor of Orchestra Is Encored.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was played by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night, for the second time this season. This was a merited recognition of the intrinsic value of this most ambitious work of the former Symphony player. It was also welcome from the public's point of view, for the character of the composition is too subtle to be comprehended at a single hearing. That the audience enjoyed the piece was evident in the outburst of applause after the performance. The composer had to rise twice from his seat and bow to his friends and admirers.

There was a new piece on the program, a symphony by Balakireff, founder of the Free School of Music in St. Petersburg and former leader of the group that included Cesar Cui, Borodin, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff. Balakireff is best known in Boston through his fantasia, "Islamey," which has been played here by many local and visiting pianists. Tschikowsky has praised Balakireff's songs. "There was a time," wrote the Russian giant, "when I could not listen to 'Selim's Son' without tears in my eyes, and now I rank 'The Song of the Goldfish' very highly." Both of these songs have been heard in Boston. At times Saturday night the symphony was brilliant; always it showed ingenuity and fertility of imagination. The audience enjoyed it greatly, twice recalling Dr. Muck.

The concert ended with a spirited reading of Charbrier's "Gwendoline" overture. There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra will be on its fifth trip to other cities. Next week two symphonic poems by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, will be a prominent feature.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER FAVORS MODERN MUSIC

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedantic tendencies, and a review of his program for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programs is not a simple task even when a man has made a specialty of concert work.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston today has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

MARCH 15 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Balakireff—Symphony in C.
Loeffler—"Pagan Poem" for orchestra and piano.
Pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.
Chabrier—"Gwendoline" overture.

Three works of the modern school, in which each composer was striving after the infinite and straining for originality, became somewhat of a task for the auditor. Of these three Chabrier's was the most tangible, Loeffler's the most subtle and Balakireff's the most ambitious.

Balakireff has also been stung by the modern tarantula and in this symphony frequently leaves the Muscovite high-road of melody. The work shows effort rather than inspiration. The introduction of the work is not especially impressive but there is the latter-day note of mystery and dread in the subordinate theme of the allegro. There is plenty of development and a rather bombastic climax in the first movement.

The Scherzo is decidedly interesting and gives some novel effects, particularly in its Coda which ends in the highest register. The andante leans to orientalism. It is rather fragmentary, a thing of shreds and patches, and not a broad slow movement such as Brahms or the accepted symphonists would write. It leads directly into the finale and both the last movements exhibit some contrapuntal skill. Again there is the Oriental flavor, this time apportioned to the clarinette, which was excellently played.

The work is long, of course, for brevity has been entirely abolished by modern orchestral composers. There is a dramatic and spicy finale, a Coda which is peppery enough and which lost nothing in the brilliant reading of Dr. Muck.

The symphony as a whole only emphasized the fact that Russia is not producing a second Tschaikowsky. During the lifetime of the latter composer he was denounced as not being Russian enough, but the German influences that worked upon him prevented him from becoming a local second-rater. Here we have Balakireff trying also to become cosmopolitan and relegate "local color" into second place. He does not wholly succeed. His new symphony is not one that is likely to become a standard work. It has some beautiful moments, but it is not a work of long breath, nor do many of even its best points linger in the memory.

The symphony was not a good preparation for Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." This work was finely played. The orchestra was in good form, the trumpets gave their triumphant fanfares with spirit, the English horn was very impressive in its "obbligato" and the pianist was perfection. Mr. Gebhard in this poem proves what a thorough artist he is. It is far more difficult to weave such a thread of piano-work into the warp and woof of such a free composition than it would be to play almost any concerto. Mr. Gebhard achieved this task not only with technical surety but with poetic instinct. He was liberally applauded and the composer also was given similar homage and forced to bow his acknowledgments.

It may have been the placing of the work that caused it to have somewhat less effect than at its first performance. Each time that we heard the "Death of Tintagiles" we liked it better. We are not quite sure that this will be the result with the "Pagan Poem." Nevertheless it is a strong picture of yearning and longing, of mystery and of spell-weaving, and when Daphnis finally comes home with his small brass band, not stopping even to wipe his feet on the door-mat, one cannot but share in the enthusiasm of the young lady who occasioned the return.

The overture to "Gwendoline" was brilliantly performed. Here we have a modern Frenchman who is melodic and powerful at the same time. He would probably never have rivalled Bizet in this field, yet his development might have been somewhat on the same lines, had he lived longer. In this overture there is far more effort than one can find in any of Bizet's compositions except, perhaps, in his weak "Patrie" overture. The work begins with heavy sequences which culminate in loud kettle-drum strokes, and the piccolo begins shrieking very early in the proceedings. The overture is intense almost all the way through. But, as above intimated, there are touches of sweet melody and the goddess of tune is not shown the door, as she is in so many modern Gallic compositions. The theme given by violoncellos and deep woodwind at the beginning, after the sequences, is beautiful. Much skilful figure development is in the overture and there is a very loud climax at the end, in which Dr. Muck allowed his brasses to go to their lung-limit. We are glad that our conductor has no Chesterfieldian suavity when it comes to working up a strong crescendo.

It is in his earnest themes that Chabrier is at his best, in some of the lighter melodies he seems more akin to Offenbach than to Bizet, and not the Offenbach of "Les Contes d'Hoffmann" either. But Chabrier is certainly one of the strong French composers and is to be placed in the same sheepfold with Bizet, Dukas, Cesar Franck etc.

At the next concert, a week from Saturday, we are to be allowed to have different schools on the same programme, our resident composer, Gustav Strube, a modern Norwegian, Halvorsen, and an interesting composer of long ago, named Beethoven, will be represented. The last-named is said to have had some very curious musical theories, such as ending when one has nothing more to say, presenting clear themes in a symmetrical relationship, writing tuneful melodies, etc. We can only conjecture what effect these unusual devices will have upon our public.

Louis C. Elson.

Farewell to Dr. Muck on Friday

Many Interesting Features of the Brooklyn Institute's Calendar for This Week.

Brooklyn will bid farewell to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he brings his band of musicians to the Baptist Temple on Friday night for the last in the series of Philharmonic concerts under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. Dr. Muck will return to Germany at the end of the current season. The programme for Friday evening is:—

Handel.....Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras.
Haydn.....Symphony in G major, No.
Mozart.....Symphony in D major (Kochel, 504

This programme will be discussed in a lecture-recital by Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason in Association Hall on Thursday afternoon.

884

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
New York City.
[illegible]

Dr. Muck will make his farewell appearances in New York at the final New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, March 19, and Saturday afternoon, March 21, at Carnegie Hall. The programme of the concert for Thursday comprises a suite from Frederick S. Converse's incidental music to Percy Mackaye's "Jeanne d'Arc," C. M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." The programme for the concert on Saturday comprises Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 6; the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of [illegible] and Beethoven's Fourth Sym-

[illegible]k, 18

[166]

TRIBUNE
New York City.
MAR 15 1908

[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] concert of the season in the Baptist Temple will take place next Friday evening, under direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The programme [illegible]

POST, MARCH 15, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A symphony in C major by Mily Balikereff, who may in a sense be called the father of the modern school, was heard for the first time in this city at the Symphony public rehearsal and concert of Friday and Saturday. Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra and piano, which was given its initial performance earlier in the season, was repeated by general request and Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline" completed the programme. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, as before, played the piano part in the performance of the Pagan Poem.

Now Balikereff is a burning patriot, and a nationalist to the backbone. The hope of the aged Glinka, the first great Russian composer, his development proceeded along strictly national lines. His important works have almost invariably been based on folk-song. Did he not, by the use of three Russian tunes, respectively representative of "Paganism," "Cossack Democracy," and "Modern Russia," portray the past, present and future of his mighty land? The orchestral fantasie, "En Boheme," which was played for the first time in Boston at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert last January in Jordan Hall, was one crazy-quilt of Czech melodies, and these melodies were strung together to form a loose, shambling, hobbling affair that was all joints.

This symphony, which is very national in context, is a far more finished and mature effort than the piece just mentioned, though in the first movement and some measures of the andante there is a still evident lack of constructuve ability. A symphony that will live requires something more than a few themes thrown into a pot together and boiled according to recipe. Balikereff is enamoured of the curve and the momentum of his dear melodies, but to combine these melodies to realize them in a manner to build a strong, proportional tonal edifice seems not always within his capacity. In the opening portion of the work he has adhered too closely to the classic mould. So many bars filled with notes, many feet ruled and measured. As the movement progresses the composer gets more truly en rapport with his task, but this section is the least successful and characteristic of the four.

The work, however, as a whole, rings true. It is genuinely and unmistakably Russian, which is something that can too seldom be said of the effusions of the so-called "modern Russian school." The orchestral style is that of Berlioz, smeared with Russian grease. There is the exotic richness and depth of color, the sensuousness, the cloying curve of Oriental song. The voice of that clarinet in the slow movement might be heard brooding over the long reaches of the steppes in the palpitating, unfathomable summer night; the tunes of the finale, with their dance rhythms and melting sensuousness, are truly of Russia. To some this music may be antagonistic, perhaps vulgar, but I confess to great pleasure in the rhythms that clamor, the lush melodies that might easily pall, the crashing drums and cymbals, the unrefined pomp and bombast, the sonorous splurges of the brass.

To go a little more into detail, the scherzo, which has a strong, symphonic pulse, is fascinating in its material and the ingenuity with which that material is handled. The andante is a romanze at once passionate and elegiac, and most sumptuously scored. It leads directly into the finale, which is practically a rondo on themes of a very national character. The free rondo form, which does not require extended development in the sense that the "sonata form" of the first movement does, is very suitable as the vehicle of such fragmentary material, and the composer is correspondingly happy and resourceful in his writing. The symphony, in spite of lapses where it savors of the perfunctory or commonplace, is a vital and individual creation.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" has been rapturously hailed as his greatest composition, his most mature and human achievement. Statements of that sort cannot possibly be conclusive at a time when we are so close to works of unusual distinction and workmanship. That Mr. Loeffler has made a notable addition to a series of works of remarkable originality is beyond dispute. That he has never written with more consummate mastery seems probable, though this question also, to be authoritatively decided, would require the most intimate acquaintance with the works of the composer and a judge versed as few are in the art of composition.

To this writer, who cannot boast so close an acquaintance with these compositions as he would desire, the Pagan Poem, at the second hearing, had not the force, the irresistible fascination and conviction of either the "Death of Tintagiles" or the "Villanelle du Diable," to mention at random two earlier orchestral works. It seems in places to be a series of episodes and the thought to be often over-elaborated.

Again and again come wonderful and engrossing passages. It could not be otherwise with a composer possessed as Mr. Loeffler of so keen and individual sense of the beautiful. The opening pages, which certainly establish a mood, and the conclusion appear at present to be the strongest parts of the work. Wondrous, throughout, are the orchestral effects, wondrous the splendid, but often cold, tints of that gorgeous palette. How rare and precious those harmonies! One feels the composer smacking his lips over some finely delineative phrase or purple tone-color. Who treasures a new and subtle taste more than he? Could anything more beautiful than the solo for the English horn, or more strangely imaginative than the far-off call of the trumpets, an idea in itself a triumph, be conceived? The effect of the combined timbres of the two instruments at the entrance of the trumpets is beyond the power of words to describe.

At times the fantasy of the composer glows at a passionate, white heat; again it subsides into quieter but no less entrancing hues. Yet, with all this, ideas seem too often to be dallied with, picked over, juggled with the tremendous enthusiasm of an untamable caprice, until there is a dangerous approach to redundancy. The warmer humanity of the music, as contrasted to what many consider the more remote former style of the composer, has been remarked upon. It is true that the music often flames with ardor, but it is the ardor of the intellect and the imagination, not of the flesh. In spite of such passages as those immediately preceding and following the last appearance of the trumpet motive Mr. Loeffler is still "un cerebral," a decadent, and so in all probability he will remain. One would not wish it otherwise, for we could not afford to lose a jot or tittle of his personality. Even the overwhelming jubilation at the end is the unmasterable exuberance of a brain and nerves always tuned to the highest pitch, and even it, to me, savors of irony and the macabre.

These are present impressions which may be altered tomorrow. No more interesting work has been heard this season; no work has more whetted curiosity. To hear it once was to ardently desire a second opportunity of so doing; to hear it twice is to have the desire for repeated hearings increased tenfold. It would be mightily interesting, now, to have an opportunity of comparing Mr. Loeffler's earlier works with this latest creation.

The performance was an exceptionally brilliant one. Mr. Gebhard, who is unsurpassed in this city as an ensemble player, excelled as he did at the first performance. At the conclusion of the piece the composer acknowledged warm and long-continued applause.

The overture to "Gwendoline" is often vulgar and melodramatic, if you will, and strongly tinctured with Wagner—what composer of Chabrier's period could well avoid being? These facts are unable to rob the music of its originality and exceeding dramatic force. It is superbly, perhaps here and there too heavily, instrumentated, and it blazed as a firebrand yesterday.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week. On the following Friday and Saturday two new compositions by Mr. Gustave Strube, the well-known composer and member of the orchestra, will be played for the first time.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Carl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera.

Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the municipal opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact that did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of 24 different programmes is not a simple task even when one has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston today has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts, if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which has been established and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

* * * *

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

MUCK AND LOEFFLER SHARE HONORS AT CONCERT

Composer of "Pagan Poem" Receives an Ovation at Saturday's Symphony Production, and Conductor of Orchestra Is Encored.

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was played by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night for the second time this season. This was a merited recognition of the intrinsic value of this most ambitious work of the former Symphony player. It was also welcome from the public's point of view, for the character of the composition is too subtle to be comprehended at a single hearing. That the audience enjoyed the piece was evident in the outburst of applause after the performance. The composer had to rise twice from his seat and bow to his friends and admirers.

There was a new piece on the program, a symphony by Balakireff, founder of the Free School of Music in St. Petersburg and former leader of the group that included Cesar Cui, Borodin, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff. Balakireff is best known in Boston through his fantasia, "Islamey," which has been played here by many local and visiting pianists. Tschikowsky has praised Balakireff's songs. "There was a time," wrote the Russian giant, "when I could not listen to 'Selim's Son' without tears in my eyes, and now I rank 'The Song of the Goldfish' very highly." Both of these songs have been heard in Boston. At times Saturday night the symphony was brilliant; always it showed ingenuity and fertility of imagination. The audience enjoyed it greatly, twice recalling Dr. Muck.

The concert ended with a spirited reading of Charbrier's "Gwendoline" overture. There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra will be on its fifth trip to other cities. Next week two symphonic poems by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra, will be a prominent feature.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER FAVORS MODERN MUSIC

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedantic tendencies, and a review of his program for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programs is not a simple task even when a man has made a specialty of concert work.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston today has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

ADVERTISER, MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1908.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Balakireff—Symphony in C.
Loeffler—"Pagan Poem" for orchestra and piano.
Pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.
Chabrier—"Gwendoline" overture.

Three works of the modern school, in which each composer was striving after the infinite and straining for originality became somewhat of a task for the auditor. Of these three Chabrier's was the most tangible, Loeffler's the most subtle, and Balakireff's the most ambitious.

Balakireff has also been stung by the modern tarantula and in this symphony frequently leaves the Muscovite high-road of melody. The work shows effort rather than inspiration. The introduction of the work is not especially impressive but there is the latter-day note of mystery and dread in the subordinate theme of the allegro. There is plenty of development and a rather bombastic climax in the first movement.

The Scherzo is decidedly interesting and gives some novel effects, particularly in its Coda which ends in the highest register. The andante leans to orientalism. It is rather fragmentary, a thing of shreds and patches, and not a broad slow movement such as Brahms or the accepted symphonists would write. It leads directly into the finale and both the last movements exhibit some contrapuntal skill. Again there is the Oriental flavor, this time apportioned to the clarinette, which was excellently played.

The work is long, of course, for brevity has been entirely abolished by modern orchestral composers. There is a dramatic and spicy finale, a Coda which is peppery enough and which lost nothing in the brilliant reading of Dr. Muck.

The symphony as a whole only emphasized the fact that Russia is not producing a second Tschaikowsky. During the lifetime of the latter composer he was denounced as not being Russian enough, but the German influences that worked upon him prevented him from becoming a local second-rater. Here we have Balakireff trying also to become cosmopolitan and relegate "local color" into second place. He does not wholly succeed. His new symphony is not one that is likely to become a standard work. It has some beautiful moments, but it is not a work of long breath, nor do many of even its best points linger in the memory.

The symphony was not a good preparation for Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." This work was finely played. The orchestra was, in good form, the trumpets gave their triumphant fanfares with spirit, the English horn was very impressive in its "obbligato" and the pianist was perfection. Mr. Gebhard in this poem proves what a thorough artist he is. It is far more difficult to weave such a thread of piano-work into the warp and woof of such a free composition than it would be to play almost any concerto. Mr. Gebhard achieved this task not only with technical surety but with poetic instinct. He was liberally applauded and the composer also was given similar homage and forced to bow his acknowledgments.

It may have been the placing of the work that caused it to have somewhat less effect than at its first performance. Each time that we heard the "Death of Tintagiles" we liked it better. We are not quite sure that this will be the result with the "Pagan Poem." Nevertheless it is a strong picture of yearning and longing, of mystery and of spell-weaving, and when Daphnis finally comes home with his small brass band, not stopping even to wipe his feet on the door-mat, one cannot but share in the enthusiasm of the young lady who occasioned the return.

The overture to "Gwendoline" was brilliantly performed. Here we have a modern Frenchman who is melodic and powerful at the same time. He would probably never have rivalled Bizet in this field, yet his development might have been somewhat on the same lines, had he lived longer. In this overture there is far more effort than one can find in any of Bizet's compositions except, perhaps, in his weak "Patrie" overture. The work begins with heavy sequences which culminate in loud kettledrum strokes, and the piccolo begins shrieking very early in the proceedings. The overture is intense almost all the way through. But, as above intimated, there are touches of sweet melody and the goddess of tune is not shown the door, as she is in so many modern Gallic compositions. The theme given by violoncellos and deep woodwind at the beginning, after the sequences, is beautiful. Much skilful figure development is in the overture and there is a very loud climax at the end, in which Dr. Muck allowed his brasses to go to their lung-limit. We are glad that our conductor has no Chesterfieldian suavity when it comes to working up a strong crescendo.

It is in his earnest themes that Chabrier is at his best, in some of the lighter melodies he seems more akin to Offenbach than to Bizet, and not the Offenbach of "Les Contes d'Hoffmann" either. But Chabrier is certainly one of the strong French composers and is to be placed in the same sheepfold with Bizet, Dukas, Cesar Franck, etc.

At the next concert, a week from Saturday, we are to be allowed to have different schools on the same programme, our resident composer, Gustav Strube, a modern Norwegian, Halvorsen, and an interesting composer of long ago, named Beethoven, will be represented. The last-named is said to have had some very curious musical theories, such as ending when one has nothing more to say, presenting clear themes in a symmetrical relationship, writing tuneful melodies, etc. We can only conjecture what effect these unusual devices will have upon our public.

Louis C. Elson.

Farewell to Dr. Muck on Friday

Many Interesting Features of the Brooklyn Institute's Calendar for This Week.

Brooklyn will bid farewell to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he brings his band of musicians to the Baptist Temple on Friday night for the last in the series of Philharmonic concerts under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. Dr. Muck will return to Germany at the end of the current season. The programme for Friday evening is:—

Handel.....Concerto in F major
For strings and two wind orchestras.
Haydn.....Symphony in G major, No. 6
Mozart.....Symphony in D major (Kochel, 504)

This programme will be discussed in a lecture-recital by Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason in Association Hall on Thursday afternoon.

884

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

New York City.

to, at Mendelssohn Hall.

Dr. Muck will make his farewell appearances in New York at the final New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, March 19, and Saturday afternoon, March 21, at Carnegie Hall. The programme of the concert for Thursday comprises a suite from Frederick S. Converse's incidental music to Percy Mackaye's "Jeanne d'Arc," C. M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." The programme for the concert on Saturday comprises Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 6; the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

[166]

TRIBUNE

New York City.

MAR 15 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's final [illegible] concert of the season in the Baptist Temple will take place next Friday evening, under direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The programme:

Concerto in F major.....Handel
For strings and two wind orchestras.
Symphony in G major, No. 6.....[illegible]
Symphony in D major (Köchel, 504).....[illegible]

[illegible] CONCERT GIVEN

First Performance of Composition by Balakireff Heard in Boston.

LOEFFLER'S ELOQUENT "PAGAN POEM" REPEATED

Orchestra Does Splendid Work Under Dr. Muck and Wins Applause.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C major.....Balakireff
"A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil)...Loeffler
Overture to "Gwendoline".....Chabrier

Balakireff has been an influence in Russia for half a century, but his only symphony was not performed until 1898, when the composer was 61 years old. Little of his music has been heard in Boston. The "Islamey" has been played by several distinguished pianists, who were tempted possibly by its reputation for mechanical difficulty. The few other piano pieces known to us in concerts have little distinction. The few songs sung here have flavor. The orchestral piece, "En Boheme," performed at Mrs. Hall's concert in Jordan Hall this season, is uninteresting, and it seemed to be more Russian than Czech, although it is founded on three Czech folk songs. We had heard nothing before last night that would give Balakireff a high position among composers of the second rank.

Yet his influence in Russian music is indisputable. He was for years the head of the "Invincible Band"—Cui, Borodin, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff; he taught them in his own way, and even Tschaikowsky, who more than once described him as a colossal bore and one that had turned from atheism to the most idolatrous superstition, courted his advice, accepted his suggestions and criticism and dedicated two of his most important orchestral works to him. The personality of the man was no doubt impressive, much more so than any individuality as displayed in his compositions. Turgeneff made fun of him in a letter to Pauline Viardot and denied him talent, yet he admitted in the same letter that he was "a character."

When the members of the "Invincible Band" met together to discuss their art, they agreed that orchestral music as written by Beethoven, Schumann, Berlioz and Liszt had gone as far as it was possible. There was nothing to be done in this direction. There were new paths to be made in the field of opera, for the Russians did not then, nor do they today, believe in the theories of Wagner or in his form of dramatic expression. The result of their agreement is ironical. Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff and even Balakireff are best known throughout the musical world by their orchestral music, and Balakireff has never completed an opera, though it is said he has worked on one.

The five also agreed that thematic material should be Russian or Russian-Oriental in line, rhythm, color, general character. True Russian music should not show the marked influence of the German and Italian schools. It should be Russian at any cost. Balakireff's collection of Russian folk songs, which is said to be excellent, served as a guide to the younger composers.

His symphony, played last night in Boston for the first time, has been performed in Chicago and Philadelphia. It is an unusually fascinating work, one that well deserved performance, one that might be repeated with profit. As I have said, it was not performed until 1898, but it is highly probable that it was at least sketched years before, as was "En Boheme," which was not published till a few years ago; as was "Tamara," a symphonic poem, which was begun in 1867, put aside and completed in 1882.

The symphony is by no means a work of continually sustained power. If it has exotic charm in melody, harmonic and orchestral color and rhythm, the charm that we have been taught to associate with the music of eastern Russia, it also has characteristics of oriental music that are not wholly agreeable to western ears: a delight in repetitions of a phrase; a persistence in rhythm that becomes monotonous; a barbaric joy in glaring colors and in the beating and clashing of pulsatile instruments.

In the finale the chief theme is a Russian folk song and the source of this tune is named in the score; but one Russian folk melody does not make a Russian symphony. This very tune is less picturesquely Oriental than other themes in the work. It has a rough, burly humor, but it has not the rhythmic or tonal suggestion of the East, nor has it the quality of a fantastical improvisation or of languorous sensuousness.

Certainly the themes of this symphony have as a rule a decided profile, and, apart from the inevitable repetitions dear to the modern Russians—Tschaikowsky did not escape from them—they are often combined or used alternately with poetic and technical skill. The instrumentation is often fantastic, at times almost bizarre, but it is generally effective. Once or twice it seemed to be intentional, as in the finale, where the principal theme in a fortissimo tutti was almost lost in the din of brass.

The first movement opens with quiet seriousness and in an orthodox manner that gives faint hope of future interest, but with the beginning of the main body of the movement, the composer's individuality begins to assert itself; there are frequent revelations of beauty and strength. The scherzo proper is a delight from beginning to end by reason of its originality and fancy; the trio is of a more conventional nature; but the reappearance of the scherzo section is a stroke of delight and the close is charming with its unexpected and quaint delicacy.

The andante, on the whole, suffers from the mania for repetition, but its principal contents are characterized by genuine sentiment and melodic grace. The finale is the most frankly exotic of the movements and the second theme, with its barbaric sentiment, is perhaps the crowning feature of the work.

[illegible] Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" [illegible]

[illegible] almost impossible to think of a performance of the [illegible] assistance in the ensemble. No one could ever play the piano part with greater comprehension of the composer's [illegible] lions or with more [illegible] the "Pagan Poem" was performed the Herald described it [illegible] ture of the work. It is not necessary to repeat the description. The performance last night was one of great brilliance and superb sonority. As before, Mr. Longy gave a marvellous reading of the solo for the English horn.

Mr. Loeffler's music will not stale with many repetitions, for in substance and in expression this "Pagan Poem" is a masterpiece of musical eloquence. It does not depend on an intimacy with the eclogue, and he that is anxious over the transliteration of Virgil's verses into music will lose the rare beauty of the music itself. The mere recollection of the amorous and forsaken woman casting her spells to bring back her lover, the remembrance of the burden of her incantations—these should be sufficient for those who insist on a programme.

Mr. Loeffler before this had composed music of indisputable originality, and for the expression of poetic and imaginative thought he had found for himself an individual musical speech that served as the language of mystery and horror, of the ironic and the macabre, of tenderness, of radiant love. With this "Pagan Poem" he has risen to a still greater height, and at the same time he has sounded a still more emotional depth. Here his appeal is broader; it is very human; his message is not merely for those interested in the tendencies of the most advanced moderns. While his melodic voice is richer and more irresistible, his orchestral rhetoric is still more diversified, fuller, more brilliant, more imposing. A composer of true genius acknowledged the applause last night.

The performance of the orchestra was one of uncommon splendor in the symphony and in the "Pagan Poem," and Dr. Muck conducted with a spirit and an authority that will be memorable.

It would be a pleasure to speak of certain details of the performance. Thus Mr. Grisez, the clarinetist, played in the symphony with much more sentiment and a finer sense of tonal contrasts than has been his wont of late. Thus the trumpets in Mr. Loeffler's poem were even more effective than at the first performance.

The concert, one of the most interesting of the season, closed with a gorgeous interpretation of Chabrier's wild overture to "Gwendoline." It is often said that the untimely death of Bizet was the greatest possible loss to musical France. The death of Chabrier was perhaps an equally severe loss; for this strangely gifted composer had still much to say when he died after a cruel death-in-life; witness his unfinished "Briseis."

CONCERTO PLAYERS IN WRONG SETTING

Parisians Hooting Down Kind of Intrusion Common at Symphony Hall.

BY PHILIP HALE.

In Paris there is a devoted band that goes to orchestral concerts for the purpose, apparently, of hissing every player of a concerto. The members of this band take pains to assure the violinist or pianist of their distinguished consideration. They mean no personal disrespect. They would not hurt any one's feelings for the world. "You are great artists, mesdames, messieurs, but you really should not expect us to listen to a concerto at a symphony concert in this year of an advanced civilization." So when the pianist prances forward to do a deed of derring do or when the violinist approaches with his fiddle in hand, there is howling in the gallery, there are remarks of a scornful, bitter, or at times, Rabelaisian nature, which reflect on the character of the composer and show a painful doubt concerning the immortality of his work.

This form of expressing an objection is unpleasant to the ear, and it at last annoys those who appreciate the purpose of the objectors, so that they in turn are noisy in a counter demonstration.

The Symphony concerts in Boston would be much more delightful if there were no virtuosos with their familiar and approved or formidable and dreaded concertos. The individuality of the virtuso is a disturbing force. It is as though a drunken and voluble reveller should invade the chaste orgies of the muses.

Nothing is more disheartening to the true lover of orchestral music than to hear some one say: "No, I don't care to go to the concert next Saturday. There's no soloist, you know." As though a Symphony concert were only a pretext for the irruption of some violinist, pianist, singer or even 'cellist. In Chicago not long ago there was a solo oboist. In old days bassoon, clarinet and trombone solos were heard in orchestral concerts of high rank, and within the last 20 years a concerto or elaborate concert piece for kettle drums has been played in this country and in England. I have the honor of knowing the accomplished virtuoso, Mr. Gordon Cleather, an affable and modest man, who drummed for a diversion and not for a living.

There is room for the virtuoso with his concerto, but the performance should be at his own concert or at a concert of a deliberately miscellaneous nature. The performance should not be in a hall so large as Symphony Hall. The older concertos, like the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, suffer thereby and the more modern ones are heard better in a smaller room, where a more intimate relationship between virtuoso and audience is established. Here is a case in point. Mr. Hinton's piano concerto was played by his wife, Mme. Goodson, at the last Worcester festival. The music then made an agreeable impression. The audience and the professional critics were well disposed toward it; at least they were not "agin" it. The critics said that the concerto was not an emotional work; that the chief themes were commonplace; that there was workmanship rather than sentiment; that the concerto was brilliant and a virtuoso [illegible] Her own enthusiasm influenced the minds of the hearers. They soon began to be interested with her; they shared her hopes and rejoiced in her fleetness and dash. In Symphony Hall this intimacy was impossible. The energy of the pianist was seen rather than felt, and this very energy soon gave the idea of a laborious task. The music remained the same, but it was not so impressive or beautiful that it made its way in the larger hall without consideration of the performance.

Nor do I intend to be disrespectful to either Mr. Hinton or his wife when I say that the introduction of this concerto ruined the artistic effect of the concert as a whole. The concerto had no business to be between Mr. Converse's romantic "Scenes" and MacDowell's nobly conceived and highly imaginative suite. These orchestral pieces were appeals to moods. The introduction of a decided personality—for Mme. Goodson is not a conventional being in costume, arrangement of hair, or manner of attacking the keys—was disturbing. A short orchestral piece of a serious nature would have preserved the harmony of the programme scheme.

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date 1 4 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND KUBELIK RECITAL

Will Divide the Musical Interest Next Week Here in Brooklyn.

TO BE DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL,

And the Last Concert of the Orchestra at the Baptist Temple.

There is decidedly an air of finality about the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. It will be the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season. It will be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn, and it will be the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Baptist Temple. When the orchestra returns to Brooklyn for its series of 1908-1909 concerts, the splendid new Academy of Music will have been completed, and for the first time since the old Academy of Music was burned the orchestra will have a fitting Brooklyn home, where it can use its entire personnel and where its patrons can all be accommodated with seats.

The regret that accompanies this much desired end is that Dr. Muck will not be here to conduct the orchestra next year. His successor, Mr. Fiedler, is said to be a man of first quality, but Dr. Muck has made so many friends and admirers in this city in the two years he has been at the head of Boston's orchestra that it seems hardly right that he should not hold the baton over it when it gives its concerts in the new Academy of Music.

For his last programme in Brooklyn he has gone back to the eighteenth century, a move which will be welcomed after the quantity of highly colored, highly emotional and exotic modern music that has made so great a part of the preceding programmes. It is always a relief, after having been dreached in color, to get back to where one can see and admire the beauty of mind, the formal beauty which characterized the three great writers for orchestra, who flourished during the seventeen hundreds. The three names on the programme are Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Handel is represented by his concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn by the loveliest of his little symphonies, that in G major, No. 6, which was named by the composer himself the "Surprise" symphony, all on account of the unexpected drum beat, by which "Papa Haydn" expected to make the women sit up, and, if all accounts are to be believed, he did. The last number on the programme will be Mozart's lovely symphony in D major, catalogued by Koechel as No. 504. There will be no soloist.

SUN,
New York City.
MAR 17 1908

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season and the final appearances of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The evening programme will consist of Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." At the afternoon concert the works will be Haydn's G major symphony No. 6, Mozart's "Figaro" overture and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

SATURDAY EXCELS FRIDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

With New Advantage for Composers, Music and Audience—Dr. Muck Begins His Last Tour—More About the New "Peter Pan"—A Play by Gorky in New York—An Organ at Keith's—Note and Comment of the Day

Theoretically, the quality of the performance at the Symphony concert of Saturday night should excel that of Friday afternoon, and an additional rehearsal on Saturday morning has happened more than once when the conductor was not satisfied with what he had heard the day before. Practically, the concert of Saturday does not always better its predecessor; sometimes indeed the advantage has been on the other side, but last week the event fulfilled the theory to the letter. On Friday, for example, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" seemed dimmed by Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" that preceded it. Saturday night it shone and it strode. Its sonorities welled and shouted and clanged again; its rhythms kept their tumult; the music swept forward—and this time up—to the mighty song of the warriors of Valhalla. Theatrical music, if one likes, and rightly because Chabrier was writing for the theatre, but as truly Viking music as though some composer of the North had written it. "They smote with their shields," goes one of the old chronicles of these Norsemen, and Chabrier, almost alone of modern composers, has really smote in the theatre for them. Saturday evening, too, Dr. Muck and his men played Mr. Loeffler's poem with a fuller intensity of mood and of accent than they have gained before. It is difficult music in itself; but the difficulties are only means to the keener imparting and emphasis of what it would convey. They exist, so to say, to be burned away for the listeners by the insistent passion with which the composer wrote and by the equal passion with which conductor and men should give his music voice. "A Pagan Poem" should speak for itself as music of beauty and power; it should speak yet more eloquently for the intensity of feeling that stirs in every measure of it. Saturday night more than ever before, the listener could feel this intensity, and from end to end it had a new poignancy and a new vividness. It was as though Dr. Muck had at last gone to the heart of the music, and so assimilated all that he found there and so made it a part of himself that he could give it a new freedom and a new intensity of utterance. His men were like him, and the performance brought irresistibly the spell, the passion, the humanity of the music.

Perhaps it was such a performance that made the piece seem so truly the "Pagan" poem of Mr. Loeffler's title. Mr. Loeffler has indeed written no imitative Virgilian eclogue in the measured felicity of expression and the delicate precision of feeling that such a musical venture might invite. Rather, he has broadened, deepened, humanized the verses that originally set spark to his imagination. It is the passion of his own responsive moods that glows and cries in his music. Yet, it is still, as it seemed on Saturday, music of pagan spirit and a pagan world. Every imaginative listener finds what he may in Mr. Loeffler's music, but it is hard to escape the suggestion, at the very beginning, of a mood like that of some Puvis de Chavannes's decorations, in our library, for example. To and fro among such faintly stirring trees, over such lonely lawns, against such wan backgrounds, in such clear pale lights, goes the sorcesess of Mr. Loeffler's poem. She is like to see to some of the figures with which Puvis has peopled this land of his imagination. They walk silently on twenty walls, and now Mr. Loeffler has given them voice. It is a pagan voice, too, the voice of a time and a spirit that felt love, and loved love and counted love as a passionate desire that we moderns, unless we happen to be pagan Latins and pagan Slavs (as Sicilians, for example, and Russians are often in reality) may not do. And the gods themselves and the mysterious beings that peopled forest and stream and cliff and valley watched over this passionate desire. Spells might lure them to foster it; spells might persuade them to choke it. The joy and the pain of it was within their power. Mr. Loeffler's music cries with such a desire; and tingles with such a sorcery.

Balakireff's symphony, too, seemed to have more exotic quality in the performance of Saturday night. Not that it escaped the conventions of "national" Russian music more than it had on Friday, but those conventions had the Oriental tinge which is the mark of Balakireff, who turns his ears eastward, as a perceptible German tinge sometimes colors Glazouroff's music as he listens, in spite of himself, to the west. This Oriental suggestion and glamor, now more keenly felt and fully expressed, gave the symphony a fresher interest and individuality. Its insistent repetitions began to justify themselves in the Oriental passion for reiteration, and Balakireff could beat his drums and beat his cymbals with Oriental delight in them. Yet the virus of that older and more sophisticated West does stir in these self-absorbed Slavs, and they seem sometimes to be confessing in this reiteration and this din, their effort and their inability to give their music the body and the significance that the West achieves by more complex means. Vodka is good to drink—and heady—on occasion. It has an exotic tang that surpasses that of Balakireff's music. But most of us come back gladly to the wines and spirits—musical or other—of a less primitive world and taste.

H. T. P.

Dr. Muck's Final Tour

This week the Symphony Orchestra is making the last of its monthly journeys for the current season to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York, and in each of the five cities Dr. Muck will conduct for the last time before he returns to Berlin. In each no less truly than in Boston he has won a public that will take warm leave of him. To give the field to the conductor himself, no singer or [illegible] the orchestra, and [illegible] Dr. Muck has made Pro-

[167]

HERALD—BOSTON—MARCH 15

18TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

First Performance of Composition by Balakireff Heard in Boston.

LOEFFLER'S ELOQUENT "PAGAN POEM" REPEATED

Orchestra Does Splendid Work Under Dr. Muck and Wins Applause.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C major.....Balakireff
"A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil)....Loeffler
Overture to "Gwendoline".....Chabrier

Balakireff has been an influence in Russia for half a century, but his only symphony was not performed until 1898, when the composer was 61 years old. Little of his music has been heard in Boston. The "Islamey" has been played by several distinguished pianists, who were tempted possibly by its reputation for mechanical difficulty. The few other piano pieces known to us in concerts have little distinction. The few songs sung here have flavor. The orchestral piece, "En Boheme," performed at Mrs. Hall's concert in Jordan Hall this season, is uninteresting, and it seemed to be more Russian than Czech, although it is founded on three Czech folk songs. We had heard nothing before last night that would give Balakireff a high position among composers of the second rank.

Yet his influence in Russian music is indisputable. He was for years the head of the "Invincible Band"—Cui, Borodin, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff; he taught them in his own way; and even Tschaikowsky, who more than once described him as a colossal bore and one that had turned from atheism to the most idolatrous superstition, courted his advice, accepted his suggestions and criticism and dedicated two of his most important orchestral works to him. The personality of the man was no doubt impressive, much more so than any individuality as displayed in his compositions. Turgeneff made fun of him in a letter to Pauline Viardot and denied him talent, yet he admitted in the same letter that he was "a character."

When the members of the "Invincible Band" met together to discuss their art, they agreed that orchestral music as written by Beethoven, Schumann, Berlioz and Liszt had gone as far as it was possible. There was nothing to be done in this direction. There were new paths to be made in the field of opera, for the Russians did not then, nor do they today, believe in the theories of Wagner or in his form of dramatic expression. The result of their agreement is ironical. Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff and even Balakireff are best known throughout the musical world by their orchestral music, and Balakireff has never completed an opera, though it is said he has worked on one.

The five also agreed that thematic material should be Russian or Russian-Oriental in line, rhythm, color, general character. True Russian music should not show the marked influence of the German and Italian schools. It should be Russian at any cost. Balakireff's collection of Russian folk songs, which is said to be excellent, served as a guide to the younger composers.

His symphony, played last night in Boston for the first time, has been performed in Chicago and Philadelphia. It is an unusually fascinating work, one that well deserved performance, one that might be repeated with profit. As I have said, it was not performed until 1898, but it is highly probable that it was at least sketched years before, as was "En Boheme," which was not published till a few years ago; as was "Tamara," a symphonic poem, which was begun in 1867, put aside and completed in 1882.

The symphony is by no means a work of continually sustained power. If it has exotic charm in melody, harmonic and orchestral color and rhythm, the charm that we have been taught to associate with the music of eastern Russia, it also has characteristics of oriental music that are not wholly agreeable to western ears: a delight in repetitions of a phrase; a persistence in rhythm that becomes monotonous; a barbaric joy in glaring colors and in the beating and clashing of pulsatile instruments.

In the finale the chief theme is a Russian folk song and the source of this tune is named in the score; but one Russian folk melody does not make a Russian symphony. This very tune is less picturesquely Oriental than other themes in the work. It has a rough, burly humor, but it has not the rhythmic or tonal suggestion of the East, nor has it the quality of a fantastical improvisation or of languorous sensuousness.

Certainly the themes of this symphony have as a rule a decided profile, and, apart from the inevitable repetitions dear to the modern Russians—Tschaikowsky did not escape from them—they are often combined or used alternately with poetic and technical skill. The instrumentation is often fantastic, at times almost bizarre, but it is generally effective. Once or twice it seemed to be injudicious, as in the finale, where the second theme in a fortissimo tutti was almost lost in the din of brass.

The first movement opens with quiet seriousness and in an orthodox manner that gives faint hope of future interest, but with the beginning of the main body of the movement, the composer's individuality begins to assert itself; there are frequent revelations of beauty and strength. The scherzo proper is a delight from beginning to end by reason of its originality and fancy; the trio is of a more conventional nature; but the free repetition of the scherzo section is a fresh delight and the close is charming in its unexpected and quaint delicacy.

The andante, on the whole, suffers from the mania for repetition, but its chief contents are characterized by genuine sentiment and melodic grace. The finale is the most frankly exotic of the movements, and the second theme, with its treatment, is perhaps the crowning glory of the work.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," suggested by certain verses in the eighth eclogue of Virgil, was performed here for the first time last November, and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist, [illegible] last evening. It would be almost impossible to think of a performance of the work without Mr. Gebhard's assistance in the ensemble. No one will ever play the piano part with greater comprehension of the composer's intentions or with keener sympathy. When the "Pagan Poem" was produced here The Herald described at length the nature of the work. It is not necessary to repeat the description. The performance last night was one of great brilliance and superb sonority. As before, Mr. Longy gave a marvellous reading of the solo for the English horn.

Mr. Loeffler's music will not stale with many repetitions, for in substance and in expression this "Pagan Poem" is a masterpiece of musical eloquence. It does not depend on an intimacy with the eclogue, and he that is anxious over the transliteration of Virgil's verses into music will lose the rare beauty of the music itself. The mere recollection of the amorous and forsaken woman casting her spells to bring back her lover, the remembrance of the burden of her incantations—these should be sufficient for those who insist on a programme.

Mr. Loeffler before this had composed music of indisputable originality, and for the expression of poetic and imaginative thought he had found for himself an individual musical speech that served as the language of mystery and horror, of the ironic and the macabre, of tenderness, of radiant love. With this "Pagan Poem" he has risen to a still greater height, and at the same time he has sounded a still more emotional depth. Here his appeal is broader; it is very human; his message is not merely for those interested in the tendencies of the most advanced moderns. While his melodic voice is richer and more irresistible, his orchestral rhetoric is still more diversified, fuller, more brilliant, more imposing. A composer of true genius acknowledged the applause last night.

The performance of the orchestra was one of uncommon splendor in the symphony and in the "Pagan Poem," and Dr. Muck conducted with a spirit and an authority that will be memorable.

It would be a pleasure to speak of certain details of the performance. Thus Mr. Grisez, the clarinetist, played in the symphony with much more sentiment and a finer sense of tonal contrasts than has been his wont of late. Thus the trumpets in Mr. Loeffler's poem were even more effective than at the first performance.

The concert, one of the most interesting of the season, closed with a gorgeous interpretation of Chabrier's wild overture to "Gwendoline." It is often said that the untimely death of Bizet was the greatest possible loss to musical France. The death of Chabrier was perhaps an equally severe loss; for this strangely gifted composer had still much to say when he died after a cruel death-in-life; witness his unfinished "Briseis."

CONCERTO PLAYERS IN WRONG SETTING

Parisians Hooting Down Kind of Intrusion Common at Symphony Hall.

BY PHILIP HALE.

In Paris there is a devoted band that goes to orchestral concerts for the purpose, apparently, of hissing every player of a concerto. The members of this band take pains to assure the violinist or pianist of their distinguished consideration. They mean no personal disrespect. They would not hurt any one's feelings for the world. "You are great artists, mesdames, messieurs, but you really should not expect us to listen to a concerto at a symphony concert in this year of an advanced civilization." So when the pianist prances forward to do a deed of derring do or when the violinist approaches with his fiddle in hand, there is howling in the gallery, there are remarks of a scornful, bitter, or at times, Rabelaisian nature, which reflect on the character of the composer and show a painful doubt concerning the immortality of his work.

This form of expressing an objection is unpleasant to the ear, and it at last annoys those who appreciate the purpose of the objectors, so that they in turn are noisy in a counter demonstration.

The Symphony concerts in Boston would be much more delightful if there were no virtuosos with their familiar and approved or formidable and dreaded concertos. The individuality of the virtuso is a disturbing force. It is as though a drunken and voluble reveller should invade the chaste orgies of the muses.

Nothing is more disheartening to the true lover of orchestral music than to hear some one say: "No, I don't care to go to the concert next Saturday. There's no soloist, you know." As though a Symphony concert were only a pretext for the irruption of some violinist, pianist, singer or even 'cellist. In Chicago not long ago there was a solo oboist. In old days bassoon, clarinet and trombone solos were heard in orchestral concerts of high rank, and within the last 20 years a concerto or elaborate concert piece for kettle drums has been played in this country and in England. I have the honor of knowing the accomplished virtuoso, Mr. Gordon Cleather, an affable and modest man, who drummed for a diversion and not for a living.

There is room for the virtuoso with his concerto, but the performance should be at his own concert or at a concert of a deliberately miscellaneous nature. The performance should not be in a hall so large as Symphony Hall. The older concertos, like the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, suffer thereby and the more modern ones are heard better in a smaller room, where a more intimate relationship between virtuoso and audience is established. Here is a case in point. Mr. Hinton's piano concerto was played by his wife, Mme. Goodson, at the last Worcester festival. The music then made an agreeable impression. The audience and the professional critics were well disposed toward it; at least they were not "agin" it. The critics said that the concerto was not an emotional work; that the chief themes were commonplace; that there was workmanship rather than sentiment; that the concerto was brilliant and a virtuoso piece.

This concerto was played a week ago last night by Mme. Goodson and the [illegible] Mme. Goodson played with the same gusto; she was nervously interested in the success of the work and she displayed a nervous energy in her performance. She probably played fully as well as at Worcester, but at Worcester the hearers were nearer to her. Her own enthusiasm influenced the minds of the hearers. They soon began to be interested with her; they shared her hopes and rejoiced in her fleetness and dash. In Symphony Hall this intimacy was impossible. The energy of the pianist was seen rather than felt, and this very energy soon gave the idea of a laborious task. The music remained the same, but it was not so impressive or beautiful that it made its way in the larger hall without consideration of the performance.

Nor do I intend to be disrespectful to either Mr. Hinton or his wife when I say that the introduction of this concerto ruined the artistic effect of the concert as a whole. The concerto had no business to be between Mr. Converse's romantic "Scenes" and MacDowell's nobly conceived and highly imaginative suite. These orchestral pieces were appeals to moods. The introduction of a decided personality—for Mme. Goodson is not a conventional being in costume, arrangement of hair, or manner of attacking the keys—was disturbing. A short orchestral piece of a serious nature would have preserved the harmony of the programme scheme.

rom Daily Eagle,
ddress ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
1-4-1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND KUBELIK RECITAL

Will Divide the Musical Interest Next Week Here in Brooklyn.

TO BE DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL,

And the Last Concert of the Orchestra at the Baptist Temple.

There is decidedly an air of finality about the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. It will be the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season. It will be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn, and it will be the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Baptist Temple. When the orchestra returns to Brooklyn for its series of 1908-1909 concerts, the splendid new Academy of Music will have been completed, and for the first time since the old Academy of Music was burned the orchestra will have a fitting Brooklyn home, where it can use its entire personnel and where its patrons can all be accommodated with seats.

The regret that accompanies this much desired end is that Dr. Muck will not be here to conduct the orchestra next year. His successor, Mr. Fiedler, is said to be a man of first quality, but Dr. Muck has made so many friends and admirers in this city in the two years he has been at the head of Boston's orchestra that it seems hardly right that he should not hold the baton over it when it gives its concerts in the new Academy of Music.

For his last programme in Brooklyn he has gone back to the eighteenth century, a move which will be welcomed after the quantity of highly colored, highly emotional and exotic modern music that has made so great a part of the preceding programmes. It is always a relief, after having been dreached in color, to get back to where one can see and admire the beauty of mind, the formal beauty which characterized the three great writers for orchestra, who flourished during the seventeen hundreds. The three names on the programme are Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Handel is represented by his concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Haydn by the loveliest of his little symphonies, that in G major, No. 6, which was named by the composer himself the "Surprise" symphony, all on account of the unexpected drum beat, by which "Papa Haydn" expected to make the women sit up, and, if all accounts are to be believed, he did. The last number on the programme will be Mozart's lovely symphony in D major, catalogued by Koechel as No. 504. There will be no soloist.

SUN,
New York City.

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season and the final appearances of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The evening programme will consist of Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." At the afternoon concert the works will be Haydn's G major symphony No. 6, Mozart's "Figaro" overture and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MARCH

SATURDAY EXCELS FRIDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

With New Advantage for Composers, Music and Audience—Dr. Muck Begins His Last Tour—More About the New "Peter Pan"—A Play by Gorky in New York—An Organ at Keith's—Note and Comment of the Day

Theoretically, the quality of the performance at the Symphony concert of Saturday night should excel that of Friday afternoon, and an additional rehearsal on Saturday morning has happened more than once when the conductor was not satisfied with what he had heard the day before. Practically, the concert of Saturday does not always better its predecessor; sometimes indeed the advantage has been on the other side, but last week the event fulfilled the theory to the letter. On Friday, for example, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" seemed dimmed by Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" that preceded it. Saturday night it shone and it strode. Its sonorities welled and shouted and clanged again; its rhythms kept their tumult; the music swept forward—and this time up—to the mighty song of the warriors of Valhalla. Theatrical music, if one likes, and rightly because Chabrier was writing for the theatre, but as truly Viking music as though some composer of the North had written it. "They smote with their shields," goes one of the old chronicles of these Norsemen, and Chabrier, almost alone of modern composers, has really smote in the theatre for them. Saturday evening, too, Dr. Muck and his men played Mr. Loeffler's poem with a fuller intensity of mood and of accent than they have gained before. It is difficult music in itself; but the difficulties are only means to the keener imparting and emphasis of what it would convey. They exist, so to say, to be burned away for the listeners by the insistent passion with which the composer wrote and by the equal passion with which conductor and men should give his music voice. "A Pagan Poem" should speak for itself as music of beauty and power; it should speak yet more eloquently for the intensity of feeling that stirs in every measure of it. Saturday night more than ever before, the listener could feel this intensity, and from end to end it had a new poignancy and a new vividness. It was as though Dr. Muck had at last gone to the heart of the music, and so assimilated all that he found there and so made it a part of himself that he could give it a new freedom and a new intensity of utterance. His men were like him, and the performance brought irresistibly the spell, the passion, the humanity of the music.

Perhaps it was such a performance that made the piece seem so truly the "Pagan" poem of Mr. Loeffler's title. Mr. Loeffler has indeed written no imitative Virgilian eclogue in the measured felicity of expression and the delicate precision of feeling that such a musical venture might invite. Rather, he has broadened, deepened, humanized the verses that originally set spark to his imagination. It is the passion of his own responsive moods that glows and cries in his music. Yet, it is still, as it seemed on Saturday, music of pagan spirit and a pagan world. Every imaginative listener finds what he may in Mr. Loeffler's music, but it is hard to escape the suggestion, at the very beginning, of a mood like that of some Puvis de Chavannes's decorations, in our library, for example. To and fro among such faintly stirring trees, over such lonely lawns, against such wan backgrounds, in such clear pale lights, goes the sorcesess of Mr. Loeffler's poem. She is like to see to some of the figures with which Puvis has peopled this land of his imagination. They walk silently on twenty walls, and now Mr. Loeffler has given them voice. It is a pagan voice, too, the voice of a time and a spirit that felt love, and loved love and counted love as a passionate desire that we moderns, unless we happen to be pagan Latins and pagan Slavs (as Sicilians, for example, and Russians are often in reality) may not do. And the gods themselves and the mysterious beings that peopled forest and stream and cliff and valley watched over this passionate desire. Spells might lure them to foster it; spells might persuade them to choke it. The joy and the pain of it was within their power. Mr. Loeffler's music cries with such a desire; and tingles with such a sorcery.

Balakireff's symphony, too, seemed to have more exotic quality in the performance of Saturday night. Not that it escaped the conventions of "national" Russian music more than it had on Friday, but those conventions had the Oriental tinge which is the mark of Balakireff, who turns his ears eastward, as a perceptible German tinge sometimes colors Glazouroff's music as he listens, in spite of himself, to the west. This Oriental suggestion and glamor, now more keenly felt and fully expressed, gave the symphony a fresher interest and individuality. Its insistent repetitions began to justify themselves in the Oriental passion for reiteration, and Balakireff could beat his drums and beat his cymbals with Oriental delight in them. Yet the virus of that older and more sophisticated West does stir in these self-absorbed Slavs, and they seem sometimes to be confessing in this reiteration and this din, their effort and their inability to give their music the body and the significance that the West achieves by more complex means. Vodka is good to drink—and heady—on occasion. It has an exotic tang that surpasses that of Balakireff's music. But most of us come back gladly to the wines and spirits—musical or other—of a less primitive world and taste.

H. T. P.

Dr. Muck's Final Tour

This week the Symphony Orchestra is making the last of its monthly journeys for the current season to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York, and in each of the five cities Dr. Muck will conduct for the last time before he returns to Berlin. In each no less truly than in Boston he has won a public that will take warm leave of him. To give the field to the conductor himself, no singer or virtuoso accompanies the orchestra, and by chance or design Dr. Muck has made pro-

...ern music. They range from Handel and Haydn of the eighteenth century down to Loeffler and Reger of the day before yesterday, and German and French, Russian and American pieces all stand upon them. Yet on five of them there is at least one classic, and the two final programmes with which Dr. Muck appears for the last time in Brooklyn and New York are wholly classical. For the other concert in New York Dr. Muck has made his first "all-American" programme, perhaps in happily conceived and grateful compliment (under all the conductor's reserve and self-effacement) to the public that next to our own in Boston has been warmest toward him. Here follow the six programmes of the week:

In Philadelphia, Monday:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, Pastoral.
MacDowell: Indian Suite.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes.

In Washington, Tuesday:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.
Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks.
Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

In Baltimore, Wednesday:

Händel: Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind Orchestras.
Reger: Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, Hiller.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes.

In New York, Thursday:

Converse: "Jeanne d'Arc," Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra.
Loeffler: A Pagan Poem.
MacDowell: Indian Suite.

In Brooklyn, Friday:

Händel: Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind Orchestras.
Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 6.
Mozart: Symphony in D major.

In New York, Saturday:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 6.
Mozart: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.

From ... Daily Times,
Address ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ... MAR 14 1908

There will be a pronounced aspect of finality about the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. It will be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn, and it will be the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Baptist Temple. When the orchestra returns to Brooklyn for its series of 1908-1909 concerts, the splendid new music hall now building will have been completed, and for the first time since the old Academy of Music was burned, the orchestra will have a fitting Brooklyn home, where it can use its entire personnel, and where its patrons can all be accommodated with seats. The regret that accompanies this much-desired end is that Dr. Muck will not be here to conduct the orchestra next year. Unquestionably his successor, Mr. Fiedler, is a man of first quality, but Dr. Muck has made such a quantity of friends and admirers in this city in the two years he has been at the head of Boston's orchestra that it seems hardly right that he should not hold the baton over it when it gives its concerts in the new Academy of Music. For his last programme in Brooklyn he has gone back to the eighteenth century—a move which will be welcomed after the quantity of highly colored, highly emotional and exotic modern music that have made so great a part of the preceding programmes. It is always a relief after having been drenched in color to get back to where one can see and admire the beauty of mind, the formal beauty which characterized the three great writers for orchestra who flourished during the seventeen hundreds. The three names on the programme are Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Handel is represented by his concerto for two wind choirs, and string orchestra; Haydn by the loveliest of his little symphonies, that in G major, No. 6, which was named by the composer himself, the Surprise Symphony, all on account of the unexpected drum beat by which Papa Haydn expected to make the ladies sit up, and if all accounts are to be believed he did. The last number on the programme will be Mozart's lovely symphony in D major, catalogued by Koechel as No. 504. There will be no soloist.

Carl Fique's lecture recital on Friday, at 4 P. M., at Association Hall, sixth and last of the Brooklyn Institute course, will be on "Frederic Chopin," the illustrations to include: Ballade, G minor, Op. 23; Etude, A flat, Op. 25; Etude, C minor, Op. 10; Larghetto from Concerto, Op. 21; Scherzo, B minor, Op. 20; Waltz, E flat, Op. 18; Polonaise, C sharp minor, Op. 26; Polonaise Brillante, E flat, Op. 22.

From ... EVENING SUN,
Address ... New York City.

Karl Muck will bid farewell to three audiences next week.

The Boston Symphony programme here on Thursday is all American: Converse's "Joan of Arc," Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

For Brooklyn on Friday there are the Handel double wind concerto, Haydn's symphony, No. 6 in G, and Mozart's, marked "504," in D.

At parting in Carnegie Hall a week from to-day, Dr. Muck will conduct the Haydn symphony, Mozart's "Figaro" overture and Beethoven's symphony No. 4.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg is to succeed Muck on his retirement to Berlin.

From ... Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address ...
MAR 14 1908

There is decidedly an air of finality about the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening, March 20. It will be the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season. It will be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn, and it will be the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Baptist Temple.

When the orchestra returns to Brooklyn for its series of 1908-1909 concerts, the splendid new music hall now building will have been completed, and for the first time since the old Academy of Music was burned, the orchestra will have a fitting Brooklyn home, where it can use its entire personnel and where its patrons can all be accommodated with seats.

The regret that accompanies this much desired end, is that Dr. Muck will not be here to conduct the orchestra next year. Unquestionably his successor, Mr. Fiedler, is a man of first quality, but Dr. Muck has made many friends and admirers here in the two years he has been at the head of Boston's orchestra.

For his last programme in Brooklyn he has gone back to the eighteenth century, a move which will be welcomed after the quantity of highly colored, highly emotional and exotic modern music that has made so great a part of the preceding programmes. It is always a relief, after having been drenched in color, to get back to where one can see and admire the beauty of mind which characterized the three great writers for orchestra who flourished during the seventeen hundreds. The three names on the programme are Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Handel is represented by his concerto for two wind choirs, and string orchestra; Haydn by the loveliest of his little symphonies, that in G major, No. 6, which was named by the composer himself the "Surprise" symphony, on account of the unexpected drum beat by which Papa Haydn expected to make the ladies sit up. The last number on the programme will be Mozart's lovely symphony in D major, catalogued by Koechel as No. 504. There will be no soloist.

Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University, will interpret, in lecture recital, on Thursday, at 4 p. m., at Association Hall, the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. These lecture recitals, one preceding each concert, are under the joint direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Mr. Mason gave the one previous to this.

From ... TRIBUNE
Address ... New York City.
MAR 15 1908

"AMERICAN" COMPOSERS.

Dr. Muck, appearing for the last time as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this week, has planned a programme exclusively made up of what is popularly called "American" music, or music written by "American" composers. Preserving, as was the wont of his predecessors, a serene disregard of what happens in the metropolis, but keeping his eye only on the needs of Boston, he has announced the late Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and Frederick S. Converse's suite, "Jeanne d'Arc." Mr. Loeffler's composition is new in its present form, and received its first performance not long ago in Boston. Mr. Converse's is made up of the incidental and between-acts music which he wrote for a play by Percy Mackaye, which had a brief existence here in one of the Broadway theatres a year and a half or so ago. Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" has been played here this season by the Russian Symphony Society, at one of the Sunday evening concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House, and two movements of it at concerts of the People's Symphony Society in Cooper Union and Carnegie Hall. It had been previously heard at concerts of the American Music Society, the Philharmonic Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When Mr. Mottl was conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House he announced it in a programme of compositions by Americans, but at the eleventh hour received a most ungracious protest from the composer and omitted it at the performance. Mr. MacDowell, in his later years, did not believe in exclusively "American" programmes.

By a coincidence the programme of the Musical Art Society last Thursday evening contained two compositions written by men identified in a way with America. One was a psalm by Mr. Loeffler, the other an a capella hymn by Wilhelm Berger. The latter is a stranger in the United States, but a well known artistic character in Germany, where he is spoken of as "Professor Wilhelm Berger, court chapelmaster of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen." Yet by one of the standards he might be classified as an American, for he was born in Boston in the same year that Mr. Loeffler was born in Mühlhausen on the Rhine. But Mr. Berger lived only one year in Boston, the first of his existence, and Mr. Loeffler has lived here a full quarter of a century. Mr. Berger's parents were foreigners and so were Mr. Loeffler's, but the expatriated baby grew up a German in every respect, while the young man who came to New York twenty-odd years ago, endured life here two or three years, then betook himself to the more congenial atmosphere of Boston, is in blood, education and taste a mixture of German, Russian, French and Bostonese, a true cosmopolite, and therefore, perhaps, the most perfect type of the true American. Converse and MacDowell are Americans, of course, having existed on this side of the Atlantic for two or three generations.

From ... [illegible]
Address ... New York City.
MAR [illegible]

Kapellmeister Max Fiedler, welcher als Nachfolger von Dr. Carl Muck zum Leiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters ernannt wurde, ist ein Mann von großer Vielseitigkeit, und sein künstlerischer Geschmack wendet sich allen Schulen in fast gleichmäßiger Neigung zu. Seine Neigung zu moderner Musik ist eine ausgeprägte. Herr Fiedler genießt in Deutschland den Ruf eines der feinsinnigsten Musiker und gilt als Autorität in der Vorführung der großen Klassiker der musikalischen Literatur. Er war jahrelang als Direktor des Hamburger Konservatoriums thätig, aber diese Lehrthätigkeit hat seine Tendenzen in keiner Weise in extrem pädagogischem oder pedantischem Sinne entwickelt, denn ein Ueberblick über die Programme, welche er als Leiter der Philharmonischen Konzerte in Hamburg aufgestellt hat, beweist, daß er bei allem Respekt vor den Großen der klassischen Periode den zeitgenössischen Komponisten die größte Aufmerksamkeit zuwendet.

Es ist ein interessanter Umstand, daß Herr Fiedler seit Henschel der erste Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters ist, dessen hauptsächlichste Erfolge im Konzertsaal ruhen. Herr Gericke kam bekanntlich von der Wiener Hofoper nach Boston und hatte fast gar keine Konzerterfahrungen. Nikisch und Paur kamen von der Leipziger Oper und keiner von Beiden hatte sich bis dahin viel mit Dirigiren von Konzerten abgegeben. Dr. Muck gelangte bekanntlich vom Dirigentenstuhl der königlichen Oper in Berlin nach Boston, und wenn er auch wiederholt sich als Konzertdirigent bethätigt hatte, so lag der Schwerpunkt seiner künstlerischen Persönlichkeit doch in der Operndirektion. Die Zusammenstellung von 24 verschiedenen Programmen in einer Saison ist gewiß keine leichte Aufgabe für einen Dirigenten und erfordert einen Mann, dessen Spezialität eben das Konzertwesen ist. Die Tradition des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters verlangt bekanntlich einen weitausgreifenden Blick in der Vorführung der Konzertprogramme. Einerseits müssen die Klassiker gebührend berücksichtigt werden, andererseits soll das Publikum der betreffenden Symphoniekonzerte jederzeit über alle bemerkenswerthen Erscheinungen der zeitgenössischen Musik auf dem Laufenden erhalten werden. Während der letzten acht Jahre der Thätigkeit Gericke's an der Spitze des berühmten Orchesters hat Boston z. B. die Bekanntschaft aller irgendwie bemerkenswerthen modernen französischen Musikwerke gemacht, so daß höchstens Paris Boston in dieser Beziehung voraus war. Dr. Muck war sehr eifrig in der Vorführung bemerkenswerther Novitäten, und unter seiner Leitung wurden nicht wenige bedeutende Werke zum erstenmal in den Vereinigten Staaten vorgeführt. Es kann kein Zweifel daran bestehen, daß Herr Fiedler diese Tradition der berühmten Musikvereinigung voll wahren wird.

From ... STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address ... New York City.

Aus der Musikwelt.

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester. — „Fidelio". — Opern-Repertoir. — Aus dem Metropolitan Opera House. — Kommende Konzerte.

Das 5. und letzte Paar Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wird in Carnegie Hall nächsten Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag abgehalten werden. Diese beiden Konzerte bedeuten die vorderhand letzte Thätigkeit in New York von Dr. Carl Muck, welcher mit Ende dieser Saison bekanntlich nach Berlin zurückkehrt, um seine Stellung als Dirigent an der königlichen Oper nach zweijährigem Urlaub wieder aufzunehmen.

Das Konzert am Donnerstag bringt zwei Werke von gebürtigen Amerikanern und ein drittes, welches von einem in den Vereinigten Staaten seit 25 Jahren lebenden Komponisten geschrieben wurde. Herr Converse ist auf dem Programm durch seine Suite dramatischer Szenen „Jeanne d'Arc" vertreten, welche ursprünglich als Begleitmusik zu Percy Mackaye's Drama gleichen Namens geschrieben wurde, welches Stück vor einem Jahr von Herrn Sothern und Frl. Marlowe gespielt wurde. Das Werk wird zum erstenmal in erweiterter Form im Konzertsaal zur Wiedergabe gebracht werden. Herr Loeffler ist auf dem Programm durch sein „Pagan Poem" vertreten, welches für Piano, Englisch-Horn und Orchester mit drei obligaten Trompeten geschrieben ist. Der Komponist hat die Inspiration zu diesem Zweck aus der zweiten Hälfte der 8. Ekloge von Virgil gezogen. McDowell ist durch seine „Indian Suite" vertreten, welche bekanntlich dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester und dessen damaligem Dirigenten Herrn Emil Paur gewidmet ist.

Das letzte Samstag-Matineekonzert bringt folgendes Programm: Haydn, G-dur-Symphonie, No. 6; Mozart, [illegible]

From ... [illegible]
Address ... [illegible]
MAR 15 1908

Dr. Karl Muck will signalize his farewell [illegible] York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by giving on next Thursday afternoon a programme of music by Americans, and on Saturday afternoon three substantial classics. Two of the American works listed are by Frederick S. Converse and Charles M. Loeffler, and are new, while the third is MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which has already had several hearings this season. At the final matinee on Saturday the programme will be:

Symphony in G major, No. 3 ....
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ....
Symphony No. 4 ....

Mr. Converse's work to be heard this evening is a suite of five movements, and is primarily music for the theatre. It was written for small orchestra in 1906, incidental and entr'acte music to Percy Mackaye's drama "Jeanne d'Arc," which was played during the following season by Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe. During the winter of 1906 and 1907 Mr. Converse rewrote this music, the overture and entr'actes, for a larger orchestra, and in the spring of 1907 it was played for the first time in Boston in Jordan Hall, with Mr. Wallace Goodrich as conductor of the orchestra. This summer Mr. Converse again rewrote and developed the music for full symphony orchestra, and in this form it had its first performance in Boston a few days ago, being played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first movement is entitled "In Domremy." The mood of this is bright and lively, showing the joy of the peasants, and in contrast to this is heard the love motif which later on is to undergo considerable development. The second movement is called "Pastoral Reverie," and in this Mr. Converse makes use of the peasant pipe. The third movement, "Battle Hymn," opens with the old "Veni Creator," the hymn sung by the soldiers under Joan of Arc when they went into battle, and later the music develops into a well developed battle scene. In "Night Visions," the fourth movement, the composer seeks to suggest the supernatural experiences of the Maid, especially a vision in which St. Michael appears. The last movement, "The Maid of God," opens with the chants of the priest for the soul of the martyr, and may be regarded as a musical résumé of her career. The simple motif of the first movement is developed to a great climax, and with the end comes the apotheosis.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," the other novelty of next Thursday, is dedicated to the memory of Gustave Schirmer. It was written originally in 1901 for performance as chamber music, and for seven instruments—pianoforte, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass. It was afterward arranged for two pianos and three trumpets, and was performed at the house of Mrs. John Gardner, April 13, 1903, with Messrs. Proctor and Gebhard as pianists. In 1905 and 1906 the work was remoulded and treated much more symphonically.

The tone poem was suggested to Mr. Loeffler by certain verses in the eighth eclogue of Virgil, which is sometimes known as "Pharmaceutria" (the Sorceress). It is dedicated to Pollio, and was written in 39 B. C. It consists of two love songs, that of Damon and of Alphesiboeus. Each song has ten parts, and these parts are divided by a recurring burden of refrain. Alphesiboeus tells of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who by the aid of the magical spells endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover Daphnis. Virgil himself borrowed the idea of this eclogue from the second idyll of Theocritus.

From ... MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address ... NEW YORK CITY
MAR 15 1908

Max Fiedler for Boston.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of wide tastes in music, and is favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. A review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience; Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsic, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be [illegible] from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed of performances of all that was worth while in modern music. As a result of Gericke's last eight years of service, Fiedler to-day has probably the largest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the [illegible] traverse his powers alike in classic and modern music. They range from Händel and Haydn of the eighteenth century down to Loeffler and Reger of the day before yesterday, and German and French, Russian and American pieces all stand upon them. Yet on five of them there is at least one classic, and the two final programmes with which Dr. Muck appears for the last time in Brooklyn and New York are wholly classical. For the other concert in New York Dr. Muck has made his first "all-American" programme, perhaps in happily conceived and grateful compliment (under all the conductor's reserve and self-effacement) to the public that next to our own in Boston has been warmest toward him. Here follow the six programmes of the week:

[168]

In Philadelphia, Monday:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, Pastoral.
MacDowell: Indian Suite.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes.

In Washington, Tuesday:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.
Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks.
Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

In Baltimore, Wednesday:

Händel: Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind Orchestras.
Reger: Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, Hiller.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes.

In New York, Thursday:

Converse: "Jeanne d'Arc," Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra.
Loeffler: A Pagan Poem.
MacDowell: Indian Suite.

In Brooklyn, Friday:

Händel: Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind Orchestras.
Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 6.
Mozart: Symphony in D major.

In New York, Saturday:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 6.
Mozart: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.

From ... Times,
Address ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ... Rubens. MAR 1 4 1908

There will be a pronounced aspect of finality about the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. It will be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn, and it will be the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Baptist Temple. When the orchestra returns to Brooklyn for its series of 1908-1909 concerts, the splendid new music hall now building will have been completed, and for the first time since the old Academy of Music was burned, the orchestra will have a fitting Brooklyn home, where it can use its entire personnel, and where its patrons can all be accommodated with seats. The regret that accompanies this much-desired end is that Dr. Muck will not be here to conduct the orchestra next year. Unquestionably his successor, Mr. Fiedler, is a man of first quality, but Dr. Muck has made such a quantity of friends and admirers in this city in the two years he has been at the head of Boston's orchestra that it seems hardly right that he should not hold the baton over it when it gives its concerts in the new Academy of Music. For his last programme in Brooklyn he has gone back to the eighteenth century—a move which will be welcomed after the quantity of highly colored, highly emotional and exotic modern music that have made so great a part of the preceding programmes. It is always a relief after having been drenched in color to get back to where one can see and admire the beauty of mind, the formal beauty which characterized the three great orchestra who flourished during the seventeen hundreds. The three names on the programme are Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Handel is represented by his concerto for two wind choirs, and string orchestra; Haydn by the loveliest of his little symphonies, that in G major, No. 6, which was named by the composer himself, the Surprise Symphony, all on account of the unexpected drum beat by which Papa Haydn expected to make the ladies sit up, and if all accounts are to be believed he did. The last number on the programme will be Mozart's lovely symphony in D major, catalogued by Koechel as No. 504. There will be no soloist.

Carl Pique's lecture recital on Friday, at 4 P. M., at Association Hall, sixth and last of the Brooklyn Institute course, will be on "Frederic Chopin," the illustrations to include: Ballade, G minor, Op. 23; Etude, A flat, Op. 25; Etude, C minor, Op. 10; Larghetto from Concerto, Op. 21; Scherzo, B minor, Op. 20; Waltz, E flat, Op. 18; Polonaise, C sharp minor, Op. 26; Polonaise Brillante, E flat, Op. 22.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.

Karl Muck will bid farewell to three audiences next week.

The Boston Symphony programme here on Thursday is all American: Converse's "Joan of Arc," Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

For Brooklyn on Friday there are the Handel double wind concerto, Haydn's symphony, No. 6 in G, and Mozart's, marked "504," in D.

At parting in Carnegie Hall a week from to-day, Dr. Muck will conduct the Haydn symphony, Mozart's "Figaro" overture and Beethoven's symphony No. 4.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg is to succeed Muck on his retirement to Berlin.

[167]

From Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address ...
Date MAR 14 1908

There is decidedly an air of finality about the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening, March 20. It will be the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season. It will be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn, and it will be the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Baptist Temple.

When the orchestra returns to Brooklyn for its series of 1908-1909 concerts, the splendid new music hall now building will have been completed, and for the first time since the old Academy of Music was burned, the orchestra will have a fitting Brooklyn home, where it can use its entire personnel and where its patrons can all be accommodated with seats.

The regret that accompanies this much desired end, is that Dr. Muck will not be here to conduct the orchestra next year. Unquestionably his successor, Mr. Fiedler, is a man of first quality, but Dr. Muck has made many friends and admirers here in the two years he has been at the head of Boston's orchestra.

For his last programme in Brooklyn he has gone back to the eighteenth century, a move which will be welcomed after the quantity of highly colored, highly emotional and exotic modern music that has made so great a part of the preceding programmes. It is always a relief, after having been drenched in color, to get back to where one can see and admire the beauty of mind which characterized the three great writers for orchestra who flourished during the seventeen hundreds. The three names on the programme are Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Handel is represented by his concerto for two wind choirs, and string orchestra; Haydn by the loveliest of his little symphonies, that in G major, No. 6, which was named by the composer himself the "Surprise" symphony, on account of the unexpected drum beat by which Papa Haydn expected to make the ladies sit up. The last number on the programme will be Mozart's lovely symphony in D major, catalogued by Koechel as No. 504. There will be no soloist.

Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University, will interpret, in lecture recital, on Thursday, at 4 p. m., at Association Hall, the programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. These lecture recitals, one preceding each concert, are under the joint direction of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Mr. Mason gave the one previous to this.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.

"AMERICAN" COMPOSERS.

Dr. Muck, appearing for the last time as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this week, has planned a programme exclusively made up of what is popularly called "American" music, or music written by "American" composers. Preserving, as was the wont of his predecessors, a serene disregard of what happens in the metropolis, but keeping his eye only on the needs of Boston, he has announced the late Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and Frederick S. Converse's suite, "Jeanne d'Arc." Mr. Loeffler's composition is new in its present form, and received its first performance not long ago in Boston. Mr. Converse's is made up of the incidental and between-acts music which he wrote for a play by Percy Mackaye, which had a brief existence here in one of the Broadway theatres a year and a half or so ago. Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" has been played here this season by the Russian Symphony Society, at one of the Sunday evening concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House, and two movements of it at concerts of the People's Symphony Society in Cooper Union and Carnegie Hall. It had been previously heard at concerts of the American Music Society, the Philharmonic Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When Mr. Mottl was conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House he announced it in a programme of compositions by Americans, but at the eleventh hour received a most ungracious protest from the composer and omitted it at the performance. Mr. MacDowell, in his later years, did not believe in exclusively "American" programmes.

By a coincidence the programme of the Musical Art Society last Thursday evening contained two compositions written by men identified in a way with America. One was a psalm by Mr. Loeffler, the other an a capella hymn by Wilhelm Berger. The latter is a stranger in the United States, but a well known artistic character in Germany, where he is spoken of as "Professor Wilhelm Berger, court chapelmaster of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen." Yet by one of the standards he might be classified as an American, for he was born in Boston in the same year that Mr. Loeffler was born in Mühlhausen on the Rhine. But Mr. Berger lived only one year in Boston, the first of his existence, and Mr. Loeffler has lived here a full quarter of a century. Mr. Berger's parents were foreigners and so were Mr. Loeffler's, but the expatriated baby grew up a German in every respect, while the young man who came to New York twenty-odd years ago, endured life here two or three years, then betook himself to the more congenial atmosphere of Boston, is in blood, education and taste a mixture of German, Russian, French and Bostonese, a true cosmopolite, and therefore, perhaps, the most perfect type of the true American. Converse and MacDowell are Americans, of course, having existed on this side of the Atlantic for two or three generations.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.

Kapellmeister Max Fiedler, welcher als Nachfolger von Dr. Carl Muck zum Leiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters ernannt wurde, ist ein Mann von großer Versatilität, und sein künstlerischer Geschmack wendet sich allen Schulen in fast gleichmäßiger Neigung zu. Seine Neigung zu moderner Musik ist eine ausgeprägte. Herr Fiedler genießt in Deutschland den Ruf eines der feinsinnigsten Musiker und gilt als Autorität in der Vorführung der großen Klassiker der musikalischen Literatur. Er war jahrelang als Direktor des Hamburger Konservatoriums thätig, aber diese Lehrthätigkeit hat seine Tendenzen in keiner Weise in extrem pädagogischem oder pedantischem Sinne entwickelt, denn ein Ueberblick über die Programme, welche er als Leiter der Philharmonischen Konzerte in Hamburg aufgestellt hat, beweist, daß er bei allem Respekt vor den Großen der klassischen Periode den zeitgenössischen Komponisten die größte Aufmerksamkeit zuwendet.

Es ist ein interessanter Umstand, daß Herr Fiedler seit Henschel der erste Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters ist, dessen hauptsächlichste Erfolge im Konzertsaal ruhen. Herr Gericke kam bekanntlich von der Wiener Hofoper nach Boston und hatte fast gar keine Konzerterfahrungen. Nikisch und Paur kamen von der Leipziger Oper und keiner von Beiden hatte sich bis dahin viel mit Dirigiren von Konzerten abgegeben. Dr. Muck gelangte bekanntlich vom Dirigentenstuhl der königlichen Oper in Berlin nach Boston, und wenn er auch wiederholt sich als Konzertdirigent bethätigt hatte, so lag der Schwerpunkt seiner künstlerischen Persönlichkeit doch in der Operndirektion. Die Zusammenstellung von 24 verschiedenen Programmen in einer Saison ist gewiß keine leichte Aufgabe für einen Dirigenten und erfordert einen Mann, dessen Spezialität eben das Konzertwesen ist. Die Tradition des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters verlangt bekanntlich einen weitausgreifenden Blick in der Vorführung der Konzertprogramme. Einerseits müssen die Klassiker gebührend berücksichtigt werden, andererseits soll das Publikum der betreffenden Symphoniekonzerte jederzeit über alle bemerkenswerthen Erscheinungen der zeitgenössischen Musik auf dem Laufenden erhalten werden. Während der letzten acht Jahre der Thätigkeit Gericke's an der Spitze des berühmten Orchesters hat Boston z. B. die Bekanntschaft aller irgendwie bemerkenswerthen modernen französischen Musikwerke gemacht, so daß höchstens Paris Boston in dieser Beziehung voraus war. Dr. Muck war sehr eifrig in der Vorführung bemerkenswerther Novitäten, und unter seiner Leitung wurden nicht wenige bedeutende Werke zum erstenmal in den Vereinigten Staaten vorgeführt. Es kann kein Zweifel daran bestehen, daß Herr Fiedler diese Tradition der berühmten Musikvereinigung voll wahren wird.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.

Aus der Musikwelt.

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester. — „Fidelio". — Opern-Repertoir. — Aus dem Metropolitan Opera House. — Kommende Konzerte.

Das 5. und letzte Paar Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wird in Carnegie Hall nächsten Donnerstag Abend uno Samstag Nachmittag abgehalten werden. Diese beiden Konzerte bedeuten die vorderhand letzte Thätigkeit in New York von Dr. Carl Muck, welcher mit Ende dieser Saison bekanntlich nach Berlin zurückkehrt, um seine Stellung als Dirigent an der königlichen Oper nach zweijährigem Urlaub wieder aufzunehmen.

Das Konzert am Donnerstag bringt zwei Werke von gebürtigen Amerikanern und ein drittes, welches von einem in den Vereinigten Staaten seit 25 Jahren lebenden Komponisten geschrieben wurde. Herr Converse ist auf dem Programm durch seine Suite dramatischer Szenen „Jeanne b'Arc" vertreten, welche ursprünglich als Begleitmusik zu Percy Mackaye's Drama gleichen Namens geschrieben wurde, welches Stück vor einem Jahr von Herrn Sothern und Frl. Marlowe gespielt wurde. Das Werk wird zum erstenmal in erweiterter Form im Konzertsaal zur Wiedergabe gebracht werden. Herr Loeffler ist auf dem Programm durch sein „Pagan Poem" vertreten, welches für Piano, Englisch-Horn und Orchester mit drei obligaten Trompeten geschrieben ist. Der Komponist hat die Inspiration zu diesem Zweck aus der zweiten Hälfte der 8. Ekloge von Virgil gezogen. McDowell ist durch seine „Indian Suite" vertreten, welche bekanntlich dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester und dessen damaligem Dirigenten Herrn Emil Paur gewidmet ist.

Das letzte Samstag-Matineekonzert bringt folgendes Programm: Haydn, G-dur-Symphonie No. 6; Mozart, Ouverture zu „Figaro's Hochzeit" und Beethoven's [illegible]

[168]

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date MAR 1 1908

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Dr. Karl Muck will signalize his farewell in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by giving on next Thursday evening a programme of music by Americans, and on Saturday afternoon three substantial classics. Two of the American works listed are by Frederick S. Converse and Charles M. Loeffler, and are new here, while the third is MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which has already had several hearings this winter. At the final matinee on Saturday the programme will be:

Symphony in G major, No. 6 ..... Haydn
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .....
Symphony No. 4 .....

Mr. Converse's work to be heard on Thursday evening is a suite of five movements, and is primarily music for the theatre. It was written for small orchestra in 1906, incidental and entr'acte music to Percy Mackaye's drama "Jeanne d'Arc," which was played during the following season by Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe. During the winter of 1906 and 1907 Mr. Converse rewrote this music, the overture and entr'actes, for a larger orchestra, and in the spring of 1907 it was played for the first time in Boston in Jordan Hall, with Mr. Wallace Goodrich as conductor of the orchestra. Last summer Mr. Converse again rewrote and developed the music for full symphony orchestra, and in this form it had its first performance in Boston ten days ago, being played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first movement is entitled "In Domrémy." The mood of this is bright and lively, showing the joy of the peasants, and in contrast to this is heard the love motif which later on is to undergo very considerable development. The second movement is called "Pastoral Reverie," and in this Mr. Converse makes use of the peasant pipe. The third movement, "Battle Hymn," opens with the old "Veni Creator," the hymn sung by the soldiers under Joan of Arc when they went into battle, and later the music develops into a well defined battle scene. In "Night Visions," the fourth movement, the composer seeks to suggest the supernatural experiences of the Maid, especially the vision in which St. Michael appears. The final movement, "The Maid of God," opens with the chants of the priest for the soul of the martyr, and may be regarded as a musical résumé of her career. The simple motif of the first movement is developed to a great climax, and with the end comes the apotheosis.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," the other novelty of next Thursday, is dedicated to the memory of Gustave Schirmer. It was written originally in 1901 for performance as chamber music, and for these instruments—pianoforte, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass. It was afterward arranged for two pianos and three trumpets, and was performed at the house of Mrs. John L. Gardner, April 13, 1903, with Messrs. Proctor and Gebhard as pianists. In 1905 and 1906 the work was remoulded and treated much more symphonically.

The tone poem was suggested to Mr. Loeffler by certain verses in the eighth eclogue of Virgil, which is sometimes known as "Pharmaceutria" (the Sorceress). It is dedicated to Pollio, and was written in 39 B. C. It consists of two love songs, that of Damon and of Alphesibœus. Each song has ten parts, and these parts are divided by a recurring burden of refrain. Alphesibœus tells of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who by the aid of the magical spells endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover Daphnis. Virgil himself borrowed the idea of this eclogue from the second idyll of Theocritus.

---

ss ...
MAR 1 1908

Max Fiedler for Boston.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of wide tastes in music, and is favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. A review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience; Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsic, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts.

TIMES,
New York City.
MAR 15 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give the Last of Its New York Concerts This Week—What Is Promised at the Opera Houses.

THE fifth and last pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera, from which post he has had two years' leave of absence.

The concert on Thursday evening will contain two works by native-born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for the past twenty-five years. It is also in a sense a New England as well as an American programme, for Mr. Converse and the late Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section; Mr. Converse still being a resident of Boston, and Charles Martin Loeffler has lived in Boston ever since he went to that city in the early eighties to be a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Converse is represented on the programme by a set of dramatic scenes entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which were originally written for a small orchestra as incidental music to the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe played a year ago. These scenes will be produced in their enlarged form in New York for the first time on Thursday evening.

Mr. Loeffler's composition is entitled "Pagan Poem," and is written for piano, English horn, and orchestra, and three trumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil.

MacDowell will be represented by his "Indian Suite," which, by the way, is dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its then conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

The programme for the last Saturday matinée concert is as follows:

Symphony in G major, No. 6.....Haydn
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.

DR. KARL MUCK'S two years of absence from the Berlin Opera House having expired, and the Kaiser declining to allow him to stay away another year, the conductor's term of service with the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends with the present season. Dr. Muck therefore will make his last appearance in New York at this week's concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and these events promise to be even more interesting than usual.

The Thursday evening concert will be made notable by the presentation of two important novelties. The first is "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scene for orchestra, by Mr. Frederick S. Converse, written primarily for Mr. Percy Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc." It dates from 1906, since when it has been rewritten for a larger orchestra and now consists of a suite in five parts, in which form it was played recently by the Boston orchestra and was well received.

The second novelty will be Mr. Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," dedicated to the memory of the late Gustav Schirmer, of New York. It was originally composed for performance as chamber music and rewritten last year for full orchestra. Certain verses of Virgil, embodying the incantation of a Thessalian maid who wishes to win back her truant lover, Daphnis, are taken as the text used for musical illustration.

In addition to these two works by living American composers, the programme on Thursday will include the Indian Suite by the late Edward A. MacDowell, dedicated to Mr. Emil Paur, at one time conductor of this orchestra.

The programme for the Saturday afternoon concert will consist of Haydn's G major symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

STAR,
NEWARK, N.J
MAR 17 1908

...594 concerts which the Bos-...ny Orchestra has given to ... organization, Newark was ... only one. Manhattan ...adelphia 146 and Brook-... do you think Provi-...ity?

d: London, 1881 ... just 107. What is

WORLD,
ess New York City.
MAR 15 1908

Last Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fifth and last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be give in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearance in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal opera. The concert on Thursday evening will include two works by native born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for the past twenty-five years. It is also in a sense a New England as well as an American programme, for Mr. Converse and the late Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section, Mr. Converse still being a resident of Boston, and Charles Martin Loeffler has lived in Boston ever since he went to that city in the early eighties to be a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Converse is represented on the programme by a set of dramatic scenes entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which were originally written for small orchestras as incidental music to the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Sothern and Marlowe played a year ago. They will be heard in their enlarged form in New York for the first time on Thursday evening.

Mr. Loeffler's composition is generally regarded as the most important work he has ever written, exceeding in value even his "Death of Tintagiles." It is entitled "Pagan Poem," and is written for piano, English horn and orchestra, and three trumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil. MacDowell will be represented by his "Indian Suite," which, by the way, is dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its then conductor, Mr. Emil Paur. The programme for the last Saturday matinee concert is as follows:

Haydn, Symphony in G major, No. 6; Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, Symphony No. 4.

From EVENING WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date /

Doings in Music World Outside Opera-Houses.

DR. KARL MUCK will make his farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last pair of concerts for the season by the Hub's famous band at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The German Emperor will grant no further leave of absence to the distinguished leader from the Royal Opera-House in Berlin. Carl Wendling, the concert master, is also to retire this year. He will return to his old love, Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling's first assistant, Richard Czerwonky, is another violinist who will be missed next year. He is to take up solo work. The successor to Dr. Muck has already been announced in this column as Max Fiedler, of the Hamburg Conservatory. No selection of a concert master has yet been made.

Two of the works announced for Thursday night are by native born American composers—"Jeanne d'Arc," a dramatic suite in five movements by Frederic S. Converse, and the Indian suite by the late Edward MacDowell. A third work is by a man who has made America his home for a quarter of a century—"A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler. The Saturday matinee programme consists of Haydn's symphony in G major, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

from Daily Times,
ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate MAR 14 1908

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concert master in Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to leave was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the Orchestra might retain his very valuable services. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Bayrouth, but this will depend entirely upon his health.

Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the Orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayrouth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the Orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
MAR 14 1908

The fifth and last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of this season will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will be the last under direction of Dr. Muck. Thursday evening the programme will represent a New England offering, as there will be two works by native-born Bostonians and one by an American by adoption of twenty-five years. These re Chrles Martin Loeffler, who early in the eighties became a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the late Edward MacDowell, and Frederic Converse. Mr. Converse will be represented by a set of dramatic scenes, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which were originally written for the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Sothern and Marlowe played a year ago. Mr. Converse has enlarged the form and they will be heard for the first time in New York in this way. Mr. Loeffler's composition is regarded as one of the most important of a man whose works have included "The Death of Tintagiles," and many other large and important orchestral works. The one selected for Thursday night's programme is "A Pagan Poem," which includes a piano in symphonic effect rather than as solo instrument. This will be played by Heinrich Gebhardt, the Boston pianist. MacDowell's number will be the "Indian Suite."

Saturday afternoon the programme will include Haydn's symphony in G major No. 6, the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's Fourth symphony.

m NEW YORK PRESS,
ress New York City.
e MAR 15 1908

The fifth and last pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will mark also the last appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin.

The concert on Thursday evening will be of more than ordinary interest, inasmuch as two works on the programme are by native-born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for twenty-five years. It is also in a sense a New England programme, for Converse and Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section of the country and Charles M. Loeffler has lived in the Hub ever since the early eighties.

Converse is represented on the list by a set of dramatic scenes, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," a work originally written for small orchestra as incidental music to the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Sothern and Marlowe played a year ago. This music, in its enlarged form, will be heard for the first time in New York.

Loeffler's composition is regarded generally as his most important work, exceeding in value even his "Death of Tintagiles." It is entitled "Pagan Poem" and is written for piano, English horn and orchestra and three trumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil. MacDowell will be represented by his "Indian Suite." Here is the programmme for the last Sunday afternoon concert: Haydn, symphony in G major, No. 6; Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, symphony No. 4.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
From New York City.
Address
Date MAR 1

BUSY WEEK FOR MUSICAL CONCERTS

Two New Works Scheduled for Last Evening's Symphony Performance.

At the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday Dr. Muck will introduce two works of first importance by American composers. The first is entitled "Jeanne d'Arc, Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra," and is by Frederick S. Converse. The second is by Charles M. Loeffler, and is entitled "Pagan Poem," for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati.

Converse's work is a suite of five movements and is primarily music for the theatre. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" is dedicated to the memory of Gustave Schirmer, and was written originally in 1901 for performance as chamber music and for these instruments: Pianoforte, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass.

ENQUIRER
CINCINNATI, OHIO
rom
ddress
ate MAR 15 1908

The annoncement from Boston that Max Fiedler, the Hamburg director, has been chosen to succeed Dr. Muck is generally regarded as a surprise. Fiedler couples a foremost position among European conductors and is a man of rigorous discipline and no musicianship. Several years ago, during the 'prima ... one of conductors of the Philhar... Tonkünstler ... several om EVENING POST, ddress New York City.

ate MAR 14 1908

Particular interest attaches to the last group of concerts to be given at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They will mark the last appearances of Dr. Karl Muck, who has won so many admirers here, but who is obliged to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera. Dr. Muck has taken a special interest in American composers, and so it is not surprising to hear that the Thursday concert is to be devoted entirely to American compositions. MacDowell will be represented by his best orchestral work, the "Indian Suite," which is dedicated to the Boston Orchestra. The two other composers on the programme are Loeffler and Converse. Loeffler's contribution is his "Pagan Poem"; it is written for piano, English horn and orchestra, and three trumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,
Address New York City.

THE fifth and last pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearance in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera, from which post he has had two years' leave of absence.

The concert on Thursday evening will be of more than ordinary interest, inasmuch as two of the works on the programme are by native born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for the past twenty-five years. It is also, in a sense, a New England as well as an American programme, for Mr. Converse and the late Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section, Mr. Converse still being a resident of Boston; and Charles Martin Loeffler has lived in Boston ever since he went to that city, in the early 80's to be a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ss
MAR 16 1908

MAX FIEDLER'S REPUTATION.

Is Regarded as an Authority on the Great Classics of Musical Literature.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of great catholicity of taste in music, and is favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

Mr. Fiedler is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Goricke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From CINCINNATI, OHIO
Address
MAR 14 1908

BOSTON'S NEW DIRECTOR

SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE ENQUIRER.

Boston, March 13.—Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as successor to Dr. Karl Muck. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

TIMES,
New York City.
MAR 14 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give the Last of Its New York Concerts This Week—What Is Promised at the Opera Houses.

THE fifth and last pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera, from which post he has had two years' leave of absence.

The concert on Thursday evening will contain two works by native-born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for the past twenty-five years. It is also in a sense a New England as well as an American programme, for Mr. Converse and the late Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section, Mr. Converse still being a resident of Boston, and Charles Martin Loeffler has lived in Boston ever since he went to that city in the early eighties to be a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Converse is represented on the programme by a set of dramatic scenes entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which were originally written for a small orchestra as incidental music to the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe played a year ago. These scenes will be produced in their enlarged form in New York for the first time on Thursday evening.

Mr. Loeffler's composition is entitled "Pagan Poem," and is written for piano, English horn, and orchestra, and three rumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil.

MacDowell will be represented by his "Indian Suite," which, by the way, is dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its then conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

The programme for the last Saturday matinée concert is as follows:

Symphony in G major, No. 6.....Haydn
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"...Mozart
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.

DR. KARL MUCK'S two years of absence from the Berlin Opera House having expired, and the Kaiser declining to allow him to stay away another year, the conductor's term of service with the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends with the present season. Dr. Muck therefore will make his last appearance in New York at this week's concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and these events promise to be even more interesting than usual.

The Thursday evening concert will be made notable by the presentation of two important novelties. The first is "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scene for orchestra, by Mr. Frederick S. Converse, written primarily for Mr. Percy Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc." It dates from 1906, since when it has been rewritten for a larger orchestra and now consists of a suite in five parts, in which form it was played recently by the Boston orchestra and was well received.

The second novelty will be Mr. Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," dedicated to the memory of the late Gustav Schirmer, of New York. It was originally composed for performance as chamber music and rewritten last year for full orchestra. Certain verses of Virgil, embodying the incantation of a Thessalian maid who wishes to win back her truant lover, Daphnis, are taken as the text used for musical illustration.

In addition to these two works by living American composers, the programme on Thursday will include the Indian Suite by the late Edward A. MacDowell, dedicated to Mr. Emil Paur, at one time conductor of this orchestra.

The programme for the Saturday afternoon concert will consist of Haydn's G major symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

per Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR.
NEWARK, N.J.

,594 concerts which the Bosony Orchestra has given to s organization, Newark was h only one. Manhattan iladelphia 146 and Brook-ay do you think Provi-
city?

d: London, 1881. Just 107. What is

WORLD,
New York City.
MAR 15 1908

Last Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fifth and last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be give in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearance in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal opera. The concert on Thursday evening will include two works by native born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for the past twenty-five years. It is also in a sense a New England as well as an American programme, for Mr. Converse and the late Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section, Mr. Converse still being a resident of Boston, and Charles Martin Loeffler has lived in Boston ever since he went to that city in the early eighties to be a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Converse is represented on the programme by a set of dramatic scenes entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which were originally written for small orchestras as incidental music to the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Sothern and Marlowe played a year ago. They will be heard in their enlarged form in New York for the first time on Thursday evening.

Mr. Loeffler's composition is generally regarded as the most important work he has ever written, exceeding in value even his "Death of Tintagiles." It is entitled "Pagan Poem," and is written for piano, English horn and orchestra, and three trumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil. MacDowell will be represented by his "Indian Suite," which, by the way, is dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its then conductor, Mr. Emil Paur. The programme for the last Saturday matinee concert is as follows

Haydn, Symphony in G major, No. 6; Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, Symphony No. 4.

From EVENING WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date /

Doings in Music World Outside Opera-Houses.

DR. KARL MUCK will make his farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last pair of concerts for the season by the Hub's famous band at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The German Emperor will grant no further leave of absence to the distinguished leader from the Royal Opera-House in Berlin. Carl Wendling, the concert master, is also to retire this year. He will return to his old love, Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling's first assistant, Richard Czerwonky, is another violinist who will be missed next year. He is to take up solo work. The successor to Dr. Muck has already been announced in this column as Max Fiedler, of the Hamburg Conservatory. No selection of a concert master has yet been made.

Two of the works announced for Thursday night are by native born American composers—"Jeanne d'Arc," a dramatic suite in five movements by Frederic S. Converse, and the Indian suite by the late Edward MacDowell. A third work is by a man who has made America his home for a quarter of a century—"A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler. The Saturday matinee programme consists of Haydn's symphony in G major, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

From Times,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 14 1908

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master in place of Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concert master in Stuttgart. Mr. Wendling has made many friends in Boston, and his decision to leave was received with much regret, as it was hoped that the Orchestra might retain his very valuable services. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Bayrouth, but this will depend entirely upon his health.

Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the Orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayrouth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the Orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

[169]

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
MAR 14 1908

The fifth and last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of this season will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will be the last under direction of Dr. Muck. Thursday evening the programme will represent a New England offering, as there will be two works by native-born Bostonians and one by an American by adoption of twenty-five years. These re Chries Martin Loeffler, who early in the eighties became a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the late Edward MacDowell, and Frederic Converse. Mr. Converse will be represented by a set of dramatic scenes, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which were originally written for the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Sothern and Marlowe played a year ago. Mr. Converse has enlarged the form and they will be heard for the first time in New York in this way. Mr. Loeffler's composition is regarded as one of the most important of a man whose works have included "The Death of Tintagiles," and many other large and important orchestral works. The one selected for Thursday night's programme is "A Pagan Poem," which includes a piano in symphonic effect rather than as solo instrument. This will be played by Heinrich Gebhardt, the Boston pianist. MacDowell's number will be the "Indian Suite."

Saturday afternoon the programme will include Haydn's symphony in G major No. 6, the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's Fourth symphony.

From NEW YORK PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date

The fifth and last pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will mark also the last appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin.

The concert on Thursday evening will be of more than ordinary interest, inasmuch as two works on the programme are by native-born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for twenty-five years. It is also in a sense a New England programme, for Converse and Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section of the country and Charles M. Loeffler has lived in the Hub ever since the early eighties.

Converse is represented on the list by a set of dramatic scenes, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," a work originally written for small orchestra as incidental music to the drama by Percy Mackaye, which Sothern and Marlowe played a year ago. This music, in its enlarged form, will be heard for the first time in New York.

Loeffler's composition is regarded generally as his most important work, exceeding in value even his "Death of Tintagiles." It is entitled "Pagan Poem" and is written for piano, English horn and orchestra and three trumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil. MacDowell will be represented by his "Indian Suite." Here is the programmme for the last Sunday afternoon concert: Haydn, symphony in G major, No. 6; Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, symphony No. 4.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,
Address New York City.
Date

BUSY WEEK FOR MUSICAL CONCERTS

Two New Works Scheduled for Last Evening's Symphony Performance.

At the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday Dr. Muck will introduce two works of first importance by American composers. The first is entitled "Jeanne d'Arc, Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra," and is by Frederick S. Converse. The second is by Charles M. Loeffler, and is entitled "Pagan Poem," for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati.

Converse's work is a suite of five movements and is primarily music for the theatre. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" is dedicated to the memory of Gustave Schirmer, and was written originally in 1901 for performance as chamber music and for these instruments: Pianoforte, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass.

per Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
MAR 15 1908
Date

rchmax of the season.

The announcement from Boston that Max Fiedler, the Hamburg director, has been chosen to succeed Dr. Muck is generally regarded as a surprise. Fiedler occupies a foremost position among European conductors, and is a man of rigorous discipline and fine musicianship. Several years ago, during the "prima donna" scheme of conductors of the Philharmonic in New York he conducted several concerts given by that organization.

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date MAR 14 1908

Particular interest attaches to the last group of concerts to be given at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They will mark the last appearances of Dr. Karl Muck, who has won so many admirers here, but who is obliged to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera. Dr. Muck has taken a special interest in American composers, and so it is not surprising to hear that the Thursday concert is to be devoted entirely to American compositions. MacDowell will be represented by his best orchestral work, the "Indian Suite," which is dedicated to the Boston Orchestra. The two other composers on the programme are Loeffler and Converse. Loeffler's contribution is his "Pagan Poem"; it is written for piano, English horn and orchestra, and three trumpets obligati. The composer has drawn his inspiration from the second half of the eighth eclogue of Virgil.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,
Address New York City.

THE fifth and last pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearance in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, who at the end of this season returns to Berlin to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera, from which post he has had two years' leave of absence.

The concert on Thursday evening will be of more than ordinary interest, inasmuch as two of the works on the programme are by native born composers, and the third by one who has made America his home for the past twenty-five years. It is also, in a sense, a New England as well as an American programme, for Mr. Converse and the late Edward MacDowell were born and raised in that section, Mr. Converse still being a resident of Boston; and Charles Martin Loeffler has lived in Boston ever since he went to that city, in the early 80's to be a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible]zen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ss
MAR 16 1908

MAX FIEDLER'S REPUTATION.

Is Regarded as an Authority on the Great Classics of Musical Literature.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of great catholicity of taste in music, and is favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

Mr. Fiedler is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Goricke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which has much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor.

The Most Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible], OHIO
Address
MAR 15 1908

BOSTON'S NEW DIRECTOR

SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE ENQUIRER.

Boston, March 13.—Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as successor to Dr. Karl Muck. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. He assumes charge of the orchestra next season, coming here early in Oct[illegible]

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R I
MAR 15 1908

DR. MUCK'S SUCCESSOR.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of 24 different programmes is not a simple task even when a man has made a specialty of concert work.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music.

As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

from POST
address COLUMBUS, O
MAR 15 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his program for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna opera-house with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the municipal opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programs is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston today has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the symphony concerts, if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

from STAR,
address WASHINGTON, D C
Date MAR 15 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon. This will be the last appearance in Washington of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been the conductor of the orchestra. The program includes Beethoven's fourth symphony, Richard Strauss' symphonic poem in rondo form, "Till Eulenspiegel, Merry Pranks," and Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwen-

MAR 15 1908

The successor of Dr. Muck to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been chosen in the person of Dr. August Max Fiedler, who will come here from Hamburg to direct the concerts of the orchestra next season. Mr. Fiedler has been conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic concerts for the last seven or eight years. He is also a pianist and a composer. Born in Zittau in 1859, he was taught piano by his father, while G. Albrecht was his teacher in theory and organ playing. He was a scholarship pupil in the Leipzig Conservatory for three years, and became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory in 1882, appearing often in public as a pianist. Fiedler is said to have an American wife. He is not a stranger to this country, for in 1905 he appeared at a pair of Philharmonic concerts in New York, having been brought there as one of several foreign conductors chosen by the society to direct its concerts.

In the selection of programmes Fiedler is said to be a man of the greatest catholicity of taste, being favorably disposed to modern music, and regarded also as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, according to a recent estimate of his work, which also states that a review of his programmes for the philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact that Mr. Fiedler is the first conductor of the orchestra since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the municipal opera in Leipzig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work.

The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that, while a majority of the works presented should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the varied tastes of the patrons of the symphony concerts if he is to succeed. It is understood that it is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor.

In addition to a new conductor next season, the Boston symphony orchestra will have a new concert master in place of Carl Wendling and a new second concert master in place of Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, for family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so, at the end of the present season, he will return to resume his position as concert master at Stuttgart. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Baireuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and if he recovers from this he will play at Baireuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue his career as a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

from NEWS
address
ate MAR 14 1908

Next Wednesday evening brings the last of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season, and the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been so successful as its conductor. Dr. Muck leaves the Orchestra at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and next year will find, as already announced, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg at the head of this organization. Dr. Muck for his last concert in Baltimore has made the programme strictly orchestral. The first number will be Haendel's Concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra. This is a work written in the "grand style," full of the stately melody which characterizes Haendel's music, and demands the highest artistry on the part of the musicians. The second number is one of the pleasing surprises of the year. It is a set of variations concluded by a fugue writen by Max Reger of Munich, on a little jolly theme taken from one of the dead and gone operettas of J. A. Hiller, who flourished mightily in Leipzig in the middle of the Eighteenth Century. The last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's clever caprice on Spanish Themes. This is the work which impelled Tschaikowsky to write to the composer that he was the greatest living master of orchestration.

AMERICAN
ress BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 15 1908

The Lyric.

Next Wednesday evening brings the last of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season, and the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been so successful as its conductor. Dr. Muck leaves the Orchestra at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and next year will find, as already announced, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, at the head of this organization. Certainly Mr. Fiedler will find the Orchestra in such a condition as it has never been before, and this is said with all due respect to the predecessors of Dr. Muck. It is greatly to be regretted that Dr. Muck is compelled to return to Germany, but much is expected of his successor, who will bring to this country a very fine reputation as a conductor.

Dr. Muck for his last concert in Baltimore has made the program strictly orchestral. The first number will be Handel's Concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra. This is a work written in the "grand style," full of the stately melody which characterizes Handel's music, and demands the highest artistry on the part of the musicians.

The second number is one of the pleasing surprises of the year. It is a set of variations concluded by a fugue written by Max Reger, of Munich, on a little jolly theme taken from one of the dead and gone operettas of J. A. Hiller, who flourished mightily in Leipsig in the middle of the eighteenth century.

The last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's diabolically clever "Caprice on Spanish Themes." This is the work which impelled Tchaikowsky to write to the composer that he was the greatest living master of orchestration. The tunes heard in it are familiar to all who have ever seen Spanish dances, and they are handled with extraordinary skill and ingenuity. The work is monstrously difficult, and only an orchestra like the Boston Symphony can attack it with a hope of success.

Seats for this last concert are now selling at 109 North Charles street, at Albaugh's ticket office.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 15 1908

Dr. Carl Muck's Farewell.

With the concluding concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place at the Lyric Wednesday evening, Baltimoreans will see for the last time in several years, at any rate, the distinguished conductor, Dr. Carl Muck. Dr. Muck, as has been announced, will leave the orchestra at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. He will be succeeded at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

An entirely orchestral program will mark the coming performance. The first number will be Handel's Concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra. The second number is regarded as one of the pleasing surprises of the year. It is a set of variations concluded by a fugue written by Max Reger, of Munich, on a little jolly theme, taken from one of the dead-and-gone operettas of J. A. Hiller. The last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's clever caprice on Spanish themes. This is the work which impelled Tchaikowsky to write to the composer that he was the greatest living master of orchestration.

from NEWS
address
ate MAR 1

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, March 18. This will also be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Baltimore. The programme will comprise Haendel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

MAR 12 1908

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, March 18. This will also be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Baltimore. The program will comprise Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Reger's Variations and Fuge on a Merry Theme, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice. Seats are now selling at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 11 1908

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
from PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck's Programme Made Up of "Outdoor" Selections.

For the final concert of the Boston Symphony season Dr. Karl Muck framed up a programme which proved him in a relenting mood. Having driven conservative souls to desperation by the Bischoff symphony and overawed the frivolous with the pretentious seriousness of Max Reger during the two preceding concerts, Doctor Muck last night relaxed into the urbane humor of the Pastoral symphony, the freedom from problematic suggestion of MacDowell's Indian suite and the tripping fandango measure as the Spanish rhythm filtered itself through the Northern and Slavic consciousness of Rimsky-Korsakoff. This Spanish caprice was heard for the first time in Philadelphia.

As will be seen from the above, it was an outdoor programme in tune with the springlike atmosphere of the last few days. The Pastoral symphony, with its Dresden china shepherds and peasants, its thunder rolling musically through the orchestra, its joyously artificial cascade, was in civilized contrast to the aboriginal rhythms and dim forest sounds of the MacDowell music, while the gipsy solos given to concertmeister Wendling during the Spanish caprice pictured a third "jolly gathering of country folk" unlike either of the foregoing.

It may be said, in passing, that the intentionally uncouth and barbaric accentuation of the Indian music gave to the tangled web of the final number a certain effect of repetition, the juxtaposition making one composition kill the other.

Throughout the programme was superbly played, the great orchestra being subdued into a suave and gracious expression. The symphony, especially, was sung tenderly, serenely, without a hint of the greater and more dominant moods of which its creator was capable; it was as the weaving of rare lace, not the heavy, more elaborate texture of Gobelin tapestry fashioned to heroic narration. The Indian music was developed with restraint and aloofness, proverbially racial attributes of the red man, MacDowell's subtle appeal not being lost in the greater abandon of the Spanish caprice, wherein the orchestration was notable for the odd duality it occasionally presented, a single violin and drum, a harp and silver bell tones.

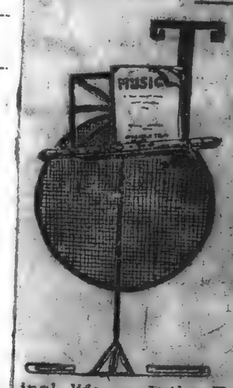
The ovation to Dr. Karl Muck at the conclusion of the concert was not alone an expression of appreciation of the fine work done during the evening, but also a general regret that this brilliant and intellectually versatile conductor is to be absent from the American concert world for some years to come. That his European sojourn is a finality his friends and admirers in this country refuse to admit. Even after the orchestra had left the stage Doctor Muck was recalled several times to bow his acknowledgments to the "Auf wiedersehen," which was the true meaning of the message conveyed by the clapping of a thousand hands.

IBLE ADDRESS, NEW YORK
IKE" NEW YORK
he First Established and Most Complete
wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ss PA
MAR 17 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON HERE

Symphony Musicians Play Three Widely Variant Compositions.

STRING CHOIR EFFECTIVE



THREE orchestral compositions widely variant in motive and manner—Beethoven's classical "Pastoral" symphony, a matchless tone-poem of rural romance; MacDowell's "Indian Suite," the most worthy and dignified attempt yet made to give orchestral form and color to the barbaric sounds and scenes of aboriginal life, and the Russian Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Airs," in which Slavic sentimentalism and Castilian abandon are curiously commingled—constituted the program of the Boston Orchestra's last concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening.

The great band was out in full strength on this occasion, and gave an unusual exhibition of orchestral virtuosity. Especially sonorous and delightful was the playing of the string choirs—peculiarly effective in the bizarre extravagances of MacDowell's Indian music, graceful and powerful throughout the symphony and colorful and flexible in the brilliant Russian music.

The Boston musicians play in Baltimore tonight, where last evening the Philadelphia Orchestra closed its local season, with Campanari as soloist. Next season's local concerts by the Boston orchestra will be limited to five, as during the past year, with Max Fiedler, the famous symphony conductor of Hamburg, Germany, as musical director.

[170]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC LEDGER

Address PHILADELPHIA PA

Date

DR. MUCK'S SUCCESSOR.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task even when a man has made a specialty of concert work.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music.

As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

---

om ... ST

ldress ...

... 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his program for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna opera-house with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the municipal opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programs is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston today has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon. This will be the last appearance in Washington of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been the conductor of the orchestra. The program includes Beethoven's fourth symphony, Richard Strauss' symphonic poem in rondo form, "Till Eulenspiegel, Merry Pranks," and Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline."

---

ess ...

... 15 1908

THE successor of Dr. Muck to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been chosen in the person of Dr. August Max Fiedler, who will come here from Hamburg to direct the concerts of the orchestra next season. Mr. Fiedler has been conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic concerts for the last seven or eight years. He is also a pianist and a composer. Born in Zittau in 1859, he was taught piano by his father, while G. Albrecht was his teacher in theory and organ playing. He was a scholarship pupil in the Leipzig Conservatory for three years, and became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory in 1882, appearing often in public as a pianist. Fiedler is said to have an American wife. He is not a stranger to this country, for in 1905 he appeared at a pair of Philharmonic concerts in New York, having been brought there as one of several foreign conductors chosen by the society to direct its concerts.

In the selection of programmes Fiedler is said to be a man of the greatest catholicity of taste, being favorably disposed to modern music, and regarded also as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, according to a recent estimate of his work, which also states that a review of his programmes for the philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact that Mr. Fiedler is the first conductor of the orchestra since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the municipal opera in Leipzig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work.

The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that, while a majority of the works presented should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston to-day has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the varied tastes of the patrons of the symphony concerts if he is to succeed. It is understood that it is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor.

In addition to a new conductor next season, the Boston symphony orchestra will have a new concert master in place of Carl Wendling and a new second concert master in place of Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, for family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so, at the end of the present season, he will return to resume his position as concert master at Stuttgart. He expects next summer to be concert master at the Wagner festival in Baireuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and if he recovers from this he will play at Baireuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue his career as a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

---

rom ...

ddress ...

ate ...

Next Wednesday evening brings the last of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season, and the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been so successful as its conductor. Dr. Muck leaves the Orchestra at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and next year will find, as already announced, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg at the head of this organization. Dr. Muck for his last concert in Baltimore has made the programme strictly orchestral. The first number will be Haendel's Concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra. This is a work written in the "grand style," full of the stately melody which characterizes Haendel's music, and demands the highest artistry on the part of the musicians. The second number is one of the pleasing surprises of the year. It is a set of variations concluded by a fugue writen by Max Reger of Munich, on a little jolly theme taken from one of the dead and gone operettas of J. A. Hiller, who flourished mightily in Leipzig in the middle of the Eighteenth Century. The last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's clever caprice on Spanish Themes. This is the work which impelled Tschaikowsky to write to the composer that he was the greatest living master of orchestration.

---

n ...

ress ...

e ...

The Lyric.

Next Wednesday evening brings the last of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season, and the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been so successful as its conductor. Dr. Muck leaves the Orchestra at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and next year will find, as already announced, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, at the head of this organization. Certainly Mr. Fiedler will find the Orchestra in such a condition as it has never been before, and this is said with all due respect to the predecessors of Dr. Muck. It is greatly to be regretted that Dr. Muck is compelled to return to Germany, but much is expected of his successor, who will bring to this country a very fine reputation as a conductor.

Dr. Muck for his last concert in Baltimore has made the program strictly orchestral. The first number will be Handel's Concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra. This is a work written in the "grand style," full of the stately melody which characterizes Handel's music, and demands the highest artistry on the part of the musicians.

The second number is one of the pleasing surprises of the year. It is a set of variations concluded by a fugue written by Max Reger, of Munich, on a little jolly theme taken from one of the dead and gone operettas of J. A. Hiller, who flourished mightily in Leipsig in the ... of the eighteenth century.

The last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's diabolically clever "Caprice on Spanish Themes." This is the work which impelled Tchaikowsky to write to the composer that he was the greatest living master of orchestration. The tunes heard in it are familiar to all who have ever seen Spanish dances, and they are handled with extraordinary skill and ingenuity. The work is monstrously difficult, and only an orchestra like the Boston Symphony can attack it with a hope of success.

Seats for this last concert are now selling at 109 North Charles street, at Albaugh's ticket office.

SUN

... 15 1908

Dr. Carl Muck's Farewell.

With the concluding concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place at the Lyric Wednesday evening, Baltimoreans will see for the last time—in several years, at any rate—the distinguished conductor, Dr. Carl Muck. Dr. Muck, as has been announced, will leave the orchestra at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. He will be succeeded at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

An entirely orchestral program will mark the coming performance. The first number will be Handel's Concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra. The second number is regarded as one of the pleasing surprises of the year. It is a set of variations concluded by a fugue written by Max Reger, of Munich, on a little jolly theme, taken from one of the dead-and-gone operettas of J. A. Hiller. The last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's clever caprice on Spanish themes. This is the work which impelled Tchaikowsky to write to the composer that he was the greatest living master of orchestration.

---

rom ... NEWS

ddress ...

ate ...

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, March 18. This will also be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Baltimore. The programme will comprise Haendel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

... 1908

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, March 18. This will also be Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Baltimore. The program will comprise Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Reger's Variations and Fuge on a Merry Theme, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice. Seats are now selling at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street.

At last we know our fate in the Boston Symphony conductorship. Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged. Security as to his efficiency is established by Dr. Muck's

[170]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ... LEDGER

Address ... PHILADELPHIA PA

Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck's Programme Made Up of "Outdoor" Selections.

For the final concert of the Boston Symphony season Dr. Karl Muck framed up a programme which proved him in a relenting mood. Having driven conservative souls to desperation by the Bischoff symphony and overawed the frivolous with the pretentious seriousness of Max Reger during the two preceding concerts, Doctor Muck last night relaxed into the urbane humor of the Pastoral symphony, the freedom from problematic suggestion of MacDowell's Indian suite and the tripping fandango measure as this Spanish rhythm filtered itself through the Northern and Slavic consciousness of Rimsky-Korsakoff. This Spanish caprice was heard for the first time in Philadelphia.

As will be seen from the above, it was an outdoor programme in tune with the springlike atmosphere of the last few days. The Pastoral symphony, with its Dresden china shepherds and peasants, its thunder rolling musically through the orchestra, its joyously artificial cascade, was in civilized contrast to the aboriginal rhythms and dim forest sounds of the MacDowell music, while the gipsy solos given to concertmeister Wendling during the Spanish caprice pictured a third "jolly gathering of country folk" unlike either of the foregoing.

It may be said, in passing, that the intentionally uncouth and barbaric accentuation of the Indian music gave to the tangled web of the final number a certain effect of repetition, the juxtaposition making one composition kill the other.

Throughout the programme was superbly played, the great orchestra being subdued into a suave and gracious expression. The symphony, especially, was sung tenderly, serenely, without a hint of the greater and more dominant moods of which its creator was capable; it was as the weaving of rare lace, not the heavy, more elaborate texture of Gobelin tapestry fashioned to heroic narration. The Indian music was developed with restraint and aloofness, proverbially racial attributes of the red man, MacDowell's subtle appeal not being lost in the greater abandon of the Spanish caprice, wherein the orchestration was notable for the odd duality it occasionally presented, a single violin and drum, a harp and silver bell tones.

The ovation to Dr. Karl Muck at the conclusion of the concert was not alone an expression of appreciation of the fine work done during the evening, but also a general regret that this brilliant and intellectually versatile conductor is to be absent from the American concert world for some years to come. That his European sojourn is a finality his friends and admirers in this country refuse to admit. Even after the orchestra had left the stage Doctor Muck was recalled several times to bow his acknowledgments to the "Auf wiedersehen," which was the true meaning of the message conveyed by the clapping of a thousand hands.

OCEANA TOURISTS ... UP ...

IBLE ADDRESS, IKE" NEW YORK NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

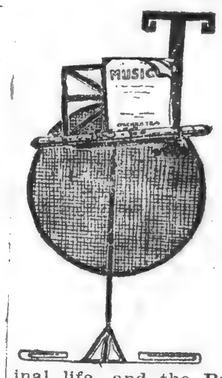
... 1908

ss ...

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON HERE

Symphony Musicians Play Three Widely Variant Compositions.

STRING CHOIR EFFECTIVE



THREE orchestral compositions widely variant in motive and manner—Beethoven's classical "Pastoral" symphony, a matchless tone-poem of rural romance; MacDowell's "Indian Suite," the most worthy and dignified attempt yet made to give orchestral form and color to the barbaric sounds and scenes of aboriginal life, and the Russian Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Airs," in which Slavic sentimentalism and Castilian abandon are curiously commingled—constituted the program of the Boston Orchestra's last concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening.

The great band was out in full strength on this occasion, and gave an unusual exhibition of orchestral virtuosity. Especially sonorous and delightful was the playing of the string choirs—peculiarly effective in the bizarre extravagances of MacDowell's Indian music, graceful and powerful throughout the symphony and colorful and flexible in the brilliant Russian music.

The Boston musicians play in Baltimore tonight, where last evening the Philadelphia Orchestra closed its local season, with Campanari as soloist. Next season's local concerts by the Boston orchestra will be limited to five, as during the past year, with Max Fiedler, the famous symphony conductor of Hamburg, Germany, as musical director.

PHILADELPHIA PA

MAR 17 1908

MUCK'S FAREWELL

Well-known Leader of the Boston Orchestra Heard in Final Concert.

Carl Muck, after two seasons with Boston Symphony Orchestra, appear- for the last time with this famous or- zation at the Academy of Music last ng. As a sort of concession to the rvatives the program was headed Beethoven's very naive Pastoral phony No. 6, in F major, while a liment to a great American was rested in the choice of McDowell's an suite in E minor, and as a sort of ical dessert, Rimsky-Korsakoff's bril- tly colored "Caprice on Spanish nes" was given for the first time in delphia.

Muck perhaps came wearied over- h with well doing; or perhaps two s with a virtuoso band that can do thing, whisper softly as a Summer eeze or strike like a thunderbolt—not very violent clay last night—has led m into such gentle ways that the old tleness and spirit are sublimated. l events, a more tame, parlor-like, dinner chamber music interpreta- has rarely been heard of the Pas- ale, very sotto voce, much drawn out with even the mutter of thunder afraid to utter its fierceness. Of course, the ness was there, the exquisite tone, the delicacy of scarcely audible phrase and the unity of interpretation, but really a farewell symphony might have been made of sterner stuff.

In the Indian suite, the rhythmic swing and piquancy of tune were revealed and the Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice glowed with barbaric beauty, and the tameness of the F major symphony was redeemed. Evidently though, Dr. Muck is a man of many moods, and his farewell to an en- thusiastic house had its somnolent as well as its soul-storming side. The re- ception he received was most gratifying and worthy of his high position. Indeed at the close he received an ovation in the fullest meaning of this much-abused term. Madame Muck was present as the guest of Mrs. Herman V. Hilprecht, and among others in the audience was Mr. Carl Busch, the composer of the "Four Winds" and an "Indian Suite" of great charm, who like MacDowell handles In- dian themes not raw-handed, but with grace and skill.

The Orchestra's Success in Baltimore

Baltimore, March 16 (Special).—The Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direc- tion of Carl Pohlig, closed its Baltimore season this evening at the Lyric. The program was as follows, with Guiseppe Campanari, the Italian barytone, as so- loist: 1. Carl Goldmark, overture, "Sak- untala," Op. 13; 2. Ludwig Van Beet- hoven, symphony No. 7, in A Major, Op. 92; 3. W. A. Mozart, aria from "Marriage of Figaro" ("Non piu andria"), Guiseppe Campanari; 4. Hector Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; 5. R. Leon- cavallo, prologue from "Pagliacci," Gui- seppe Campanari. Judging from the en- thusiastic reception given to the conduct- or and the orchestra this evening, there can be no question as to the popularity of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Monu- mental City. Miss Shearer, who has been actively engaged in promoting the interests of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Baltimore, and to whose energies the suc- cess attending the concerts is largely due, expresses great confidence in the future of the organization in her city and antici- pates a very large subscription sale for next season's concerts.

PHILADELPHIA PA

MAR 17 1908

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL

Closing Concert of the Season of the Boston Symphony.

With last evening's concert at the Academy of Music the Boston Sym- phony Orchestra closed its twenty-third season in Philadelphia, the occasion, too, being the last appearance of Dr. Karl Muck in this city as director of that organization. Although the concert was enjoyable the program was not extra- ordinary. The most interesting feature was the Orchestral Suite in E. Minor, No. 2, "Indian," by MacDowell, a work which shows what can be done with typical American themes by an Amer- ican composer. Upon the melodic basis of simple Indian themes, MacDowell built an elaborate harmonic structure, full of instrumental beauty. The se- lection was played exquisitely by Dr. Muck's men. In a certain sense this suite is "program music," but the de- scriptive passages are much more sub- tle than those of the Pastoral Symphony, the Beethoven number which stood first on the program. This is not saying that MacDowell was greater than Beet- hoven, but merely calls attention to the fact that the American composer enjoyed a great advantage in having been born later than the German mas- ter.

The symphony itself was played with a delicacy which almost reconciled one to the puerilities of its thunderstorm.

Three numbers constituted the concert, the third being a caprice on Spanish themes by the Russian composer, Rim- sky-Korsakoff, a composition in which the melancholy of the Slav blends with Ionian joyousness.

At the close of the concert Dr. Muck had to bow his acknowledgements to ap- plause three times before the audience departed.

It is a thousand pities that we shall not have him with us longer.

om .....

dress .....

The last of the season's Boston Sym- phony concerts will be given in the Acad- emy of Music to-morrow evening. This concert marks the last appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been at the head of the orchestra. Conditions in Berlin compel his return to that city and do not admit of his staying longer in Amer- ica. It is generally admitted that he will leave the orchestra in a higher state of efficiency than it ever attained in the past.

His last program for Philadelphia of- fers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be MacDowell's Indian Suite, which is, perhaps, the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky- Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish airs.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra as successor to Dr. Muck, is a man of greatest catho- licity of taste in music, and is particu- larly favorably disposed to modern mu- sic. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical litera- ture. His years as director of the Ham- burg Conservatory seem not to have de- veloped in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Ham- burg shows that, while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

BULLETIN

om .....

dress PHILADELPHIA P

te MAR 17 190

Max Fiedler has been appointed con- ductor of the Boston Symphony Orches- tra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, who is compelled to return to Germany. Mr. Fiedler is said to be a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and in par- ticular favorably disposed toward modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical litera- ture. His years as director of the Ham- burg Conservatory, it is said, have not developed in him any pedagogic or pe- dantic tendencies, and while he pays due respect to the great ones of the past he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact that Fiedler will be the first conductor the or- chestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experi- ence; Nikisch and Paur were from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and Dr. Muck is from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and, while he has done considerable concert work during his career, was, until he be- came leader of the Boston organization, primarily an operatic conductor.

, 1

om .....

dress .....

te .....

PRESS

PHILA PA

MAR

The musical season of 1907-08 is rapidly drawing to a close and the first sign of the end is the announcement of the last of the Boston Symphony concerts of the Winter, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening.

This concert takes on additional interest because it marks the last appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been at the head of Boston's orchestra, and with it has accomplished such splendid artistic results.

His last program for Philadelphia of- fers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be MacDowell's Indian suite, which is perhaps the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky- Korsakoff's diabolically clever caprice on Spanish airs, a work which has placed this Russian among the first masters of the art of orchestration.

, 188

18.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Or- chestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is particularly favorably disposed to mod- ern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musi- cians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of mu- sical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera.

84

PHILADELPHIA PA

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert in Philadelphia for the present season at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, when the pro- gram will include Beethoven's Pastoral symphony, MacDowell's Indian Suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish. There will be no soloist. This will prob- ably be Conductor Muck's farewell ap- pearance here, as he will return to Ber- lin at the end of his current engagement.

PRESS

PHILA PA

MAR 15 1908

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fol- lowing program at its concerts last week:— Mill Balakiref ..... symphony in C major Ch. M. Loeffler ..... (First time.) Chabrier ..... "Pagan Poem" ..... overture, "Gwendoline"

188

om STAATS ZEITUNG,

dress New York City.

te MAR 19

Dr. Muck's Abschied.

Von besonderer Bedeutung ist das am Freitag Abend vom Bostoner Symphonie- Orchester unter den Auspicien des In- stituts für Künste und Wissenschaften im Baptist Temple gegebene Konzert, weil mit demselben der geniale Leiter der Ka- pelle, Dr. Karl Muck, Abschied vom Brooklyner Publikum nimmt. Dr. Muck hat sich in den beiden Saisons, in welch- er an der Spitze der „Bostoner" steht, wie in den anderen amerikanischen Groß- städten auch in Brooklyn zahlreiche Be- wunderer und Freunde erworben, die ihm morgen Abend wahrscheinlich den Abschied schwer machen werden. Das morgige Programm umfaßt Piecen von Haendel, Haydn und Mozart.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

Address New York City.

Date 1908

DR. KARL MUCK.

He makes his farewell appearances in New York to-night and Saturday after- noon.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, PA

7

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Last Local Concert for Current Season

The last local concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last even- it does not call for extended com- ent. Of the three numbers which com- ed the program the most important the sixth, or "Pastoral" symphony thoven, and as of all the great more considerable works this the most suffered from the usury any other of the nine would en more welcome. When it writing program music the men leave the classical composers and the "Pastoral" symphony, is program music pure and simple, from the comparisons which it her two things played were Mac- graceful and melodious "In- suite which it was a pleasure to and which revived one's regret at ted musician's untimely and end, and a clever set of on Spanish themes by Rimsky- As Mr. Carl Muck is to re- to Berlin at the close of the pres- season, last night's was his farewell here, but he is such an un- program maker that so far delphia is concerned his depar- ll hardly be greatly mourned. e who can offer the patrons of Symphony Orchestra a menu consisting on its instrumental Bizet's Ballet variations and the el" thing is what Voltaire prophet Habbakuk, "capable may be hoped that Mr. r, who comes next, will treat

NEW YORK

BLE ADDRESS, KE" NEW YORK

he First Established and Most Complete wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA PA

88

MAR 18 1908

MUCK FAREWELL CONCERT

The last Boston Symphony concert of the winter will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. This concert is additionally interesting because, it is the last appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been at the head of the Boston Or- chestra, and with it has accomplished splendid artistic results. Everywhere the orchestra has gone Doctor Muck has made friends, and it is with sincere regret on the part of all music lovers that condi- tions in Berlin do not admit of his stay- ing longer in America. Doctor Muck leaves with regret all the more keen because he is just getting thoroughly in touch with conditions in this country, and it seems a pity that he cannot continue his work among us. It is the general opinion in Boston that he leaves the orchestra in a higher state of efficiency even than it attained in the past.

His last programme for Philadelphia of- fers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be MacDowell's Indian suite, which is among the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky- Korsakoff's brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Airs."

om PHILADELPHIA PA

dress

te MAR 14

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season will be given at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. It will also be the last appearance here of Con- ductor Karl Muck, whom Emperor Wil- liam refuses to release for another sea- son.

His last programme for Philadelphia offers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be McDowell's Indian Suite, which is perhaps the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky-Norsa- koff's diabolically clever Caprice on Span- ish airs, a work which has placed this Russian among the first masters of the art of orchestration.

Max Fiedler will succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the orchestra. He is said to be a man of great catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorable to the modern school.

From BULLETIN

Address PHILADELPHIA PA

Date MAR 14 1908

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which Dr. Karl Muck will make his last appearance in Philadelphia as conductor, will occur at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The program, on which there will be no soloist, offers nothing in the way of novelty, but is attractive in its presen- tation of favorite compositions. These in- clude Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's "Indian Suite," and Rimsky- Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Airs."

om EVENING TELEGRAPH

ddress NEW YORK CITY

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MacDowell's Orchestral Suite Chief Number on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last evening concert at Car- negie Hall last night. MacDowell's Orchestral Suite in E Minor, No. 2, In- dian Op. 48, was the chief number on the programme.

The others were Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," Op. 28, and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obli- gati. Dr. Karl Muck conducted.

MUCK'S FAREWELL

The Well-known Leader of the Boston Orchestra Heard in Final Concert.

Dr. Carl Muck, after two seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the last time with this famous organization at the Academy of Music last evening. As a sort of concession to the conservatives the program was headed with Beethoven's very naive Pastoral Symphony No. 6, in F major, while a compliment to a great American was suggested in the choice of McDowell's Indian suite in E minor, and as a sort of musical dessert, Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliantly colored "Caprice on Spanish Themes" was given for the first time in Philadelphia.

Dr. Muck perhaps came wearied overmuch with well doing; or perhaps two years with a virtuoso band that can do anything, whisper softly as a Summer breeze or strike like a thunderbolt—not a very violent clap last night—has led him into such gentle ways that the old resoluteness and spirit are sublimated. At all events, a more tame, parlor-like, after-dinner chamber music interpretation has rarely been heard of the Pastorale, very sotto voce, much drawn out with even the mutter of thunder afraid to utter its fierceness. Of course, the finesse was there, the exquisite tone, the delicacy of scarcely audible phrase and the unity of interpretation, but really a farewell symphony might have been made of sterner stuff.

In the Indian suite, the rhythmic swing and piquancy of tune were revealed and the Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice glowed with barbaric beauty, and the tameness of the F major symphony was redeemed. Evidently though, Dr. Muck is a man of many moods, and his farewell to an enthusiastic house had its somnolent as well as its soul-storming side. The reception he received was most gratifying and worthy of his high position. Indeed at the close he received an ovation in the fullest meaning of this much-abused term. Madame Muck was present as the guest of Mrs. Herman V. Hilprecht, and among others in the audience was Mr. Carl Busch, the composer of the "Four Winds" and an "Indian Suite" of great charm, who like MacDowell handles Indian themes not raw-handed, but with grace and skill.

The Orchestra's Success in Baltimore

Baltimore, March 16 (Special).—The Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Carl Pohlig, closed its Baltimore season this evening at the Lyric. The program was as follows, with Guiseppe Campanari, the Italian barytone, as soloist: 1. Carl Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala," Op. 13; 2. Ludwig Van Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A Major, Op. 92; 3. W. A. Mozart, aria from "Marriage of Figaro" ("Non piu andria"), Guiseppe Campanari; 4. Hector Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; 5. R. Leoncavallo, prologue from "Pagliacci," Guiseppe Campanari. Judging from the enthusiastic reception given to the conductor and the orchestra this evening, there can be no question as to the popularity of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Monumental City. Miss Shearer, who has been actively engaged in promoting the interests of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Baltimore, and to whose energies the success attending the concerts is largely due, expresses great confidence in the future of the organization in her city and anticipates a very large subscription sale for next season's concerts.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BLE ADDRESS,
KE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

he First Established and Most Complete
wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Last Local Concert for Current Season

The last local concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last evening. It does not call for extended comment. Of the three numbers which comprised the program the most important was the sixth, or "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, and as of all the great master's more considerable works this has the most suffered from the usury of time, any other of the nine would have been more welcome. When it comes to writing program music the modern men leave the classical composers far behind and the "Pastoral" symphony, which is program music pure and simple, suffers from the comparisons which it evokes.

The other two things played were MacDowell's graceful and melodious "Indian" suite, which it was a pleasure to hear and which revived one's regret at this gifted musician's untimely and melancholy end, and a clever set of variations on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff. As Mr. Carl Muck is to return to Berlin at the close of the present season, last night's was his farewell appearance here, but he is such an unsatisfactory program maker that so far as Philadelphia is concerned his departure will hardly be greatly mourned.

Anyone who can offer the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a menu exclusively consisting on its instrumental side of Reger's Hille variations and the "Eulenspiegel" thing is what Voltaire said of the prophet Habbakuk, "capable tout." It may be hoped that Mr. Fiedler, who comes next, will treat

PHILADELPHIA RECORD

MAR 17 1908

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL

Closing Concert of the Season of the Boston Symphony.

With last evening's concert at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its twenty-third season in Philadelphia, the ocasion, too, being the last appearance of Dr. Karl Muck in this city as director of that organization. Although the concert was enjoyable the program was not extraordinary. The most interesting feature was the Orchestral Suite in E. Minor, No. 2, "Indian," by MacDowell, a work which shows what can be done with typical American themes by an American composer. Upon the melodic basis of simple Indian themes, MacDowell built an elaborate harmonic structure, full of instrumental beauty. The selection was played exquisitely by Dr. Muck's men. In a certain sense this suite is "program music," but the descriptive passages are much more subtle than those of the Pastoral Symphony, the Beethoven number which stood first on the program. This is not saying that MacDowell was greater than Beethoven, but merely calls attention to the fact that the American composer enjoyed a great advantage in having been born later than the German master.

The symphony itself was played with a delicacy which almost reconciled one to the puerilities of its thunderstorm.

Three numbers constituted the concert, the third being a caprice on Spanish themes by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, a composition in which the melancholy of the Slav blends with Ionian joyousness.

At the close of the concert Dr. Muck had to bow his acknowledgements to applause three times before the audience departed.

It is a thousand pities that we shall not have him with us longer.

The last of the season's Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. This concert marks the last appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been at the head of the orchestra. Conditions in Berlin compel his return to that city and do not admit of his staying longer in America. It is generally admitted that he will leave the orchestra in a higher state of efficiency than it ever attained in the past.

His last program for Philadelphia offers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be MacDowell's Indian Suite, which is, perhaps, the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish airs.

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra as successor to Dr. Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that, while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

MAR 18 1908

MUCK FAREWELL CONCERT

The last Boston Symphony concert of the winter will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. This concert is additionally interesting because it is the last appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been at the head of the Boston Orchestra, and with it has accomplished splendid artistic results. Everywhere the orchestra has gone Doctor Muck has made friends, and it is with sincere regret on the part of all music lovers that conditions in Berlin do not admit of his staying longer in America. Doctor Muck leaves with regret all the more keen because he is just getting thoroughly in touch with conditions in this country, and it seems a pity that he cannot continue his work among us. It is the general opinion in Boston that he leaves the orchestra in a higher state of efficiency even than it attained in the past.

His last programme for Philadelphia offers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be MacDowell's Indian suite, which is among the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Airs."

BULLETIN

MAR 17

Max Fiedler has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, who is compelled to return to Germany. Mr. Fiedler is said to be a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and in particular favorably disposed toward modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory, it is said, have not developed in him any pedagogic or predantic tendencies, and while he pays due respect to the great ones of the past he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact that Fiedler will be the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience; Nikisch and Paur were from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and Dr. Muck is from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and, while he has done considerable concert work during his career, was, until he became leader of the Boston organization, primarily an operatic conductor.

---

* * *

The musical season of 1907-08 is rapidly drawing to a close and the first sign of the end is the announcement of the last of the Boston Symphony concerts of the Winter, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening.

This concert takes on additional interest because it marks the last appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past two years has been at the head of Boston's orchestra, and with it has accomplished such splendid artistic results.

His last program for Philadelphia offers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be MacDowell's Indian suite, which is perhaps the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's diabolically clever caprice on Spanish airs, a work which has placed this Russian among the first masters of the art of orchestration.

* * *

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera.

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season will be given at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. It will also be the last appearance here of Conductor Karl Muck, whom Emperor William refuses to release for another season.

His last programme for Philadelphia offers no novelty. The first work will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The second will be McDowell's Indian Suite, which is perhaps the highest American achievement in orchestral music. The third and last number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's diabolically clever Caprice on Spanish airs, a work which has placed this Russian among the first masters of the art of orchestration.

Max Fiedler will succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the orchestra. He is said to be a man of great catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorable to the modern school.

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which Dr. Karl Muck will make his last appearance in Philadelphia as conductor, will occur at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The program, on which there will be no soloist offers nothing in the way of novelty, but is attractive in its presentation of favorite compositions. These include Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, MacDowell's "Indian Suite," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Airs."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert in Philadelphia for the present season at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, when the program will include Beethoven's Pastoral symphony, MacDowell's Indian Suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish. There will be no soloist. This will probably be Conductor Muck's farewell appearance here, as he will return to Berlin at the end of his current engagement.

---

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the following program at its concerts last week:—
Mili Balakireff ..... symphony in C major
Ch. M. Loeffler (First time.)
Chabrier ..... overture, "Gwendoline"
London ..... "Pagan Poem" 188

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Dr. Muck's Abschied.

Von besonderer Bedeutung ist das am Freitag Abend vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter den Auspicien des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften im Baptist Temple gegebene Konzert, weil mit demselben der geniale Leiter der Kapelle, Dr. Karl Muck, Abschied vom Brooklyner Publikum nimmt. Dr. Muck hat sich in den beiden Saisons, in welchen er an der Spitze der „Bostoner" steht, wie in den anderen amerikanischen Großstädten auch in Brooklyn zahlreiche Bewunderer und Freunde erworben, die ihm morgen Abend wahrscheinlich den Abschied schwer machen werden. Das morgige Programm umfaßt Piecen von Haendel, Haydn und Mozart.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
Address New York City.
Date

DR. KARL MUCK.

He makes his farewell appearances in New York to-night and Saturday afternoon.

From
Address
Date

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MacDowell's Orchestral Suite Chief Number on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night. MacDowell's Orchestral Suite in E Minor, No. 2, Indian Op. 48, was the chief number on the programme.

The others were Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," Op. 23, and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati. Dr. Karl Muck conducted.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

LOEFFLER'S AND CONVERSE'S MUSIC IN NEW YORK

"A Pagan Poem" and "Jeanne d'Arc" Played for the First Time There by the Symphony Orchestra — The Reviewers' Impressions—Dr. Muck Conducting Again —And Still Those Programmes—Mrs. Stevens's Recital — Miss Nethersole's Striking Magda—Ben Jonson's "Bartholomew Fair" to Be Acted Here Next Month—The Press Agent as Hero—Dr. Muck's Future—Other News of the Day

After reluctant absence in Baltimore and Washington, Dr. Muck was able to conduct again at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night in New York with the "All-American," and indeed "All-Bostonian," programme with which, seemingly he would compliment American composers and American audiences. It began with the "Dramatic Scenes" that Mr. Converse has rearranged and rewritten from his music for Percy MacKaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc"; proceeded with Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and ended with MacDowell's "Indian" suite. Mr. Loeffler's piece was played for the first time in New York; and Mr. Converse's has been heard there only in its original form of incidental music in the theatre and under the clouding conditions that dim such music there. MacDowell's suite, on the other hand, was altogether familiar and by no less than three repetitions in Carnegie Hall this very winter. As for Dr. Muck, hampered as he was by his neuritic right arm, the Sun says succinctly this morning: "The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was superb, and Dr. Muck conducted with his customary insight. He was made to understand that the audience was sorry to part with him."

"Let us confess," the Sun proceeds, "to an inability to fathom the entire scheme of Mr. Loeffler's composition. There is a splendid display of sonorous orchestration, and the piano part is written in such a manner as to give it strong individuality and call for high skill on the part of the player. All the resources of modern dissonant harmony are called into use in the course of the piece, and the acrid chords of the dominant French school are heard in plenty. Nevertheless there are passages in which the old fashioned fundamentals of music are employed, and as usual in such cases these are the episodes which provide the most substantial pleasure to the hearer. The English horn sings the songs of the Thessalian girl with exquisite accents. Here indeed the composer has given us a mood both pastoral and archaic, an atmosphere at once tender and remote. The piano, we take it, represents the palpitating girl herself, while the three obbligato trumpets heard behind the scenes carry to us the voice of the distant and hesitating Daphnis. In his use of these three trumpets Mr. Loeffler has accomplished something delightful and has given us an uncommon musical effect. Last night the sounds of the instruments were conveyed into the auditorium through a telephone armed with a horn. The tonal result was something wonderfully beautiful. The distance was perfectly simulated and the voices of the brass instruments acquired a mysterious and mellow quality quite indescribable. But let us admit that in the portions of the composition which intervened between these episodes there was much that appeared inexplicable. The Thessalian girl seemed to be lost in a tremendous outpouring of orchestral splendor altogether modern in method and spirit. There was nothing of the soul of Virgil or his eclogue in these passages. They smacked rather of the French theatre of today."

"Of course, we must have the new," continues the Tribune, "and have them (sic) as Mr. Loeffler gave them (sic) to us last night in his 'Pagan Poem,' with its moments of exquisite imaginative as well as sensuous beauty. These moments, however, were episodic, and while listening to the composition, which we were invited to hear as music inspired by the eighth eclogue of Virgil, the conviction would not down that the piece had been laboriously built around the passage for three trumpets played in the distance, with its accompanying song from the English horn and pianoforte. That music sounded antique, if one must have it so, and sounded, moreover, like the evocation of an enchanter's wand, but much of that with which it is associated must wait till Debussy has completed his education of the Philistines before it can boast of being understood and admired."

Of Mr. Converse's "Dramatic Scenes," the Sun says: "Joan of Arc has been a source of inspiration to artists in many lands. That she might find a fitting apostrophizer in music was undoubtedly the hope of those who sat them down last night to listen to the suite of Mr. Converse. The first movement, indeed, promised well. It is a gay and gallant movement in which the happy freedom of the peasantry is fairly well depicted by musical means not unfamiliar to the experienced concertgoer, but none the less skilfully employed. There is a serious contrasting theme in this movement, afterward heard in some carefully prepared developments which undoubtedly signify the ardent devotion of the inspired maid. After that the flight of Mr. Converse's muse was close to old mother earth. Except in the use of the archaic hymn, 'Veni Creator,' there was nothing to breathe the spirit of the early fifteenth century, nothing to paint the sorrows of downtrodden France, nothing to chant the pride of perfidious Albion. The reverie might have been a comforting visitant to one of Millet's peasants as well as to Joan of Arc. The battle scene was just a musical hurly burly of the conventional sort, and by no means effective at that. The visions were slumbrous enough, and the summary of the maid's career in the last movement breathed nothing of that rare spirit which vowed that her life work was none of her own choosing, but was to be done in obedience to the call of the Most High.

If the emotional scheme of an artistic embodiment of the Maid of Orleans admits of anything at all, it certainly admits of the voicing of that celestial rapture which made her death glorious. But it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Mr. Converse found his inspiration in Mr. MacKaye's play and not in one of the most singular and characteristic individual survivals of the spirit which swept through Europe in the tumultuous passion of the Crusades. There is good scoring in Mr. Converse's composition, but in these days that is expected of every man who employs the orchestra for the expression of his ideas. The work is not at all absorbing to the thoughtful hearer, whether regarded as the expression of a great idea or as mere music. Mr. Converse has written things that will probably wear longer than this."

The Tribune adds of the same piece: "Mr. Converse's suite was obviously made to save his music from the fate of Mr. MacKaye's play. We fear that it will not prove an exception to the rule which time seems to have established for music of its character. Some of it—the second movement, for instance—has independent beauty whose appreciation does not call for the exercise of a fancy warmed by the incidents of the drama or the familiar tale of the Maid of Orleans; some of it will appeal in vain in spite of its dramatic or poetic association. What may be said of it in general in the way of approbation applies to its naturalness—conventionality, if the extremists prefer the word—of utterance at a time when there is a prevalent notion that the only new music worth listening to is that which subjects the old and accepted elements of the art to violence. Yet there are those—and they are not necessarily all Philistines (though the apellation is coming into good repute) who think with Selden and Goldsmith that many old things are most worthy of affection—old scales, old harmonies, old instrumental combinations even."

Dr. Muck and His Programmes

To the Editor of the Transcript:

It seems to me that your two correspondents of recent date who have written about Dr. Muck's programmes overlook the fact that the purpose of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not to furnish a maximum of pleasure to "nine-tenths of the audience," but to afford a medium for the cultivation of a liberal and catholic taste, for the acquaintance of worthy music by contemporaries of acknowledged capacity; to help on the progress of music, as well as to nurture respect and admiration for the classics. It is a comparatively easy task to please an audience; to elevate or educate it is not only ungrateful but thankless. Dr. Muck, as is well known, is not in sympathy with much of modern music. All honor to him, therefore, in that his sense of impartiality and of educational necessity has had more weight with him than his personal predilections.

MUSIC LOVER

March 20.

In view of the speculation about Dr. Muck's future, with which various newspapers in other cities are amusing themselves and their readers, it is only the truth to say that the conductor returns to Berlin to fulfill the long contract under which he is engaged at the opera house there; and that no human being knows or can foretell, what he will do after the distant expiration of that contract. Other than this contract, there are no "understandings" of any sort as to his future in Germany or in America, but the probability is, if the German newspapers speak truly, that next year, besides his work at the opera house, he will succeed the departed Weingartner as the conductor of the symphony concerts of the Court Orchestra.

Mr. Wendling, the concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, was well received by the audiences at Washington and Baltimore when he conducted on Tuesday and Wednesday at the concerts there of the Boston Orchestra. By all critical accounts, moreover, he acquitted himself well in a task that was almost new to him.

From NEW YORK HERALD,
Address New York City.
Date MAR

'BOSTON SYMPHONY" IN AMERICAN MUSIC

Closing the present evening series, a concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. It was also one of the farewells of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra. His final farewell will take place at the Saturday matinee concert of the orchestra here.

Furthermore, last night's programme was devoted to American composers and contained two novelties and one old favorite. It began with a novelty, Mr. Frederick S. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," a suite of five dramatic scenes. This music was composed as incidental to Mr. Percy Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc," but the composer amplified and revamped it until it assumed its present shape. It is disappointing music. The chief interest lies in the beginning, and then it drags its way rather slowly through the four remaining movements. It sounds like music that might pass muster in a theatre, backed by scenery and flanked by action and dialogue, but in the concert hall it will scarcely earn for its composer everlasting fame.

Then came Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," a work also new to New York. It was inspired by some verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, but the composition does not follow the text save in a free trend. The music is wonderfully poetic and admirably effective.

To give the trumpet players off stage the proper cue a telephone was hung on the wall at the side and a paper funnel, resembling a megaphone, was inserted as a mouthpiece. This composition enlists the services of a pianist, which was ably assumed by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The final number was McDowell's "Indian Suite," a composition popular and well beloved. The playing of the orchestra was again above reproach and Dr. Muck was warmly applauded by an enormous audience. He received as a present a wreath, which he blushingly carried off

[172]

TIMES,
New York City.
MAR 20 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of American Music at the Last Evening Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes now on its last visit this season, and the two concerts—that of last evening and that of to-morrow afternoon—are the last that Dr. Muck will conduct here. There was recognition of this fact in the prolonged applause that greeted him as he appeared upon the platform last evening, and again after the first number, when a large wreath was handed up to him. The concert was devoted to the works of American composers, two of which were played for the first time in New York. These were F. S. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, Opus 28, and C. M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Opus 14. The programme was completed by Edward MacDowell's "Indian" suite for orchestra, Opus 48.

It would be difficult to imagine from three compositions the characteristics of an "American school," so widely apart are they in aim and in execution. Yet they are all of a quality, even a distinction, that no American music lover need be ashamed of. Mr. Converse's music is a suite arranged from incidental music written for Percy Mackaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc," yet it is much more than incidental music as that term is commonly used. There are leading motives, which represent different characters, situations, and emotional phases of the drama, to use his own words, and by their use he attempted to build up an artistic incidental music with a unity of purpose and expression entirely lacking in the fragmentary, unrelated, and often meaningless and irrelevant music that is used in theatrical representations. Such music should have substance and importance enough for performance by itself, and Mr. Converse's, in the form of the five "dramatic scenes" in which he presents it, has such substance and importance.

These are entitled, respectively, "In Domrémy," "Pastoral Reverie," "Battle Hymn," "Night Vision," "The Maid of God." The music is ingratiating, charming, largely pictorial in its purpose, yet potent in evoking moods and suggesting a spiritual sympathy with the dramatic scenes which it illustrates. Mr. Converse has an abundance of melodic invention and skill in the use of his material to develop an artistic fabric—skill not only in thematic treatment, but also in the use of the orchestra and of orchestral colors. He has made good use in heightening the suggestiveness of his music, of old French folk-song, and of the ancient hymn, "Veni creator spiritus." The former occurs in the first movement "In Domrémy," the latter in the stirring "Battle Hymn." This first movement and the last are the most elaborately developed of the five.

The "Pastoral Reverie" is a graceful elucidation of the idea signified in its title, with the pastoral tones of the English horn. The last, "The Maid of God," giving "an emotional résumé of her whole career," is the strongest portion of the work, and the climax to which it is developed, the martial strains of the pageantry of the King's coronation, is wrought with fine skill.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" is suggested by a portion of one of Virgil's Eclogues, a love song and a love incantation of a Thessalian maiden endeavoring to bring back her truant lover. Mr. Loeffler has reworked this composition a number of times, as he has so much else of his music that has had public performance. It was originally a piece for chamber music, was remolded and treated more symphonically, and finally attained its present shape, which is for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, the trumpets being heard at different distances off the stage, and only at the close with the rest of the orchestra.

This statement of the material means employed suggests that the composer has made elaborate experiments in instrumental timbres in the piece, and such is the case. The pianoforte part is difficult and elaborate, yet is treated essentially as a part of the ensemble. Most noteworthy is the use of the three distant trumpets playing in strange and dissonant harmonies faintly heard. With these has gone a marvelously skillful use of the orchestra, of all its colors and their combinations, and there are effects here that are of strange power and subtle effectiveness. The substance of Mr. Loeffler's music is surcharged with a high and fertile imagination. It is far from being an exact translation into tones of Virgil's poem.

The music has no servile dependence upon the literary programme, nor does it follow it page by page. It is, however, potent in suggestion of the poem, of the crying amorousness of the pagan maiden. There is a note of sensuousness in it. There are gloom and despair, and there is frantic, almost savage, rejoicing. Obviously pleasing in its material and substance the music is not.

There are passages that may well puzzle and baffle even the sympathetic listener on a first hearing. The harmonic structure that Mr. Loeffler has built up takes him into the strange and not always comfortable regions of dissonance to which all ears are not inured. His themes are not immediately to be grasped, nor are the skill and certainty of touch with which the contrapuntal structure to be at once fully appreciated, though they can hardly be overlooked by the attentive listener. That it is the work of a musician of consummate powers is evident, and there are pages of the keenest and most poignant beauty.

Dr. Muck played all this music, as well as MacDowell's Indian suite, familiar through repeated hearings in New York, with the utmost sincerity and enthusiasm. It is one of the traits of this remarkable master that he conducts everything as if it were for him, at this particular moment, the one thing he most believed in. The orchestra played superbly. In Mr. Loeffler's piece Mr. Heinrich Gebhard took the pianoforte obbligato with remarkable skill and insight. The other obbligato players were not mentioned, but Mr. Longy's performance on the English horn was unmistakable.

From GERMAN HERALD
NEW YORK CITY
Address
Date MAR 20 1908

Der beim gestrigen Abend in der Carnegie Hall stattgehabten letzten Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wurde Dr. Karl Muck, der berühmte Leiter desselben, durch Überreichung reichlicher Blumenspenden, sowie anderer Geschenke geehrt. Man bemerkte allgemein, daß der [illegible]

SUN,
New York City.
MAR 20 1908

[illegible] MUSIC FESTIVAL

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S LAST EVENING CONCERT.

Frederick S. Converse Discourses in Many Tones of "Joan of Arc," and Charles Martin Loeffler Translates an Eclogue of Virgil—MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

Dr. Carl Muck, making his final appearance last night at an evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, elected to present three compositions by American composers. These were Frederick S. Converse's dramatic scenes for orchestra entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obligati, and Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite." The first two were new to local music lovers, but the last is an old friend.

Mr. Converse's music was made originally in 1906 for small orchestra and was intended for performance with the play of "Percy Mackaye," enacted by Mr. Sothern, Miss Marlowe and their associates. In the winter of 1906 and 1907 Mr. Converse rewrote this music for large orchestra and last summer he rewrote it again. It is in the general form of a suite and has five movements, with these titles, "In Domremy," "Pastoral Reverie," "Battle Hymn," "Night Visions" and "The Maid of God."

Joan of Arc has been a source of inspiration to artists in many lands. That she might find a fitting apostrophizer in music was undoubtedly the hope of those who sat them down last night to listen to the suite of Mr. Converse. The first movement, indeed, promised well. It is a gay and gallant movement in which the happy freedom of the peasantry is fairly well depicted by musical means not unfamiliar to the experienced concertgoer but none the less skilfully employed. There is a serious contrasting theme in this movement, afterward heard in some carefully prepared developments which undoubtedly signify the ardent devotion of the inspired maid.

After that the flight of Mr. Converse's muse was close to old mother earth. Except in the use of the archaic hymn "Veni Creator" there was nothing to breathe the spirit of the early fifteenth century, nothing to paint the sorrows of downtrodden France, nothing to chant the pride of perfidious Albion. The reverie might have been a comforting visitant to one of Millet's peasants as well as to Joan of Arc.

The battle scene was just a musical hurly burly of the conventional sort, and by no means effective at that. The visions were slumbrous enough, and the summary of the maid's career in the last movement breathed nothing of that rare spirit which vowed that her life work was none of her own choosing, but was to be done in obedience to the call of the Most High.

If the emotional scheme of an artistic embodiment of the Maid of Orleans admits of anything at all, it certainly admits of the voicing of that celestial rapture which made her death glorious. But it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Mr. Converse found his inspiration in Mr. Mackaye's play and not in one of the most singular and characteristic individual survivals of the spirit which swept through Europe in the tumultuous passion of the Crusades.

There is good scoring in Mr. Converse's composition, but in these days that is expected of every man who employs the orchestra for the expression of his ideas. The work is not at all absorbing to the thoughtful hearer, whether regarded as the expression of a great idea or as mere music. Mr. Converse has written things that will probably wear longer than this.

Mr. Loeffler's work is an attempt to reproduce in music something of the feeling of certain lines in the eighth eclogue of Virgil. It was first conceived as a piece of chamber music in 1901. Afterward it was remade for two pianos and three trumpets and finally took its present form. The poetry on which it is founded represents a Thessalian girl endeavoring to lure back her lover and the key of the whole is found in the refrain, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home."

Let us confess to an inability to fathom the entire scheme of this composition. There is a splendid display of sonorous orchestration, and the piano part is written in such a manner as to give it strong individuality and call for high skill on the part of the player. All the resources of modern dissonant harmony are called into use in the course of the composition and the acrid chords of the dominant French school are heard in plenty. Nevertheless there are passages in which the old fashioned fundamentals of music are employed, and as usual in such cases these are the episodes which provide the most substantial pleasure to the hearer.

The English horn sings the songs of the Thessalian girl with exquisite accents. Here indeed the composer has given us a mood both pastoral and archaic, an atmosphere at once tender and remote. The piano, we take it, represents the palpitating girl herself, while the three obbligato trumpets heard behind the scenes carry to us the voice of the distant and hesitating Daphnis.

In his use of these three trumpets Mr. Loeffler has accomplished something delightful and has given us an uncommon musical effect. Last night the sounds of the instruments were conveyed into the auditorium through a telephone armed with a horn. The tonal result was something wonderfully beautiful. The distance was perfectly simulated and the voices of the brass instruments acquired a mysterious and mellow quality quite indescribable. But let us admit that in the portions of the composition which intervened between these episodes there was much that appeared inexplicable. The Thessalian girl seemed to be lost in a tremendous outpouring of orchestral splendor altogether modern in method and spirit. There was nothing of the soul of Virgil or his eclogue in these passages. They smacked rather of the French theatre of today."

"Of course, we must have the new," continues the Tribune, "and have them (sic) as Mr. Loeffler gave them (sic) to us last night in his 'Pagan Poem,' with its moments of exquisite imaginative as well as sensuous beauty. These moments, however, were episodic, and while listening to the composition, which we were invited to hear as music inspired by the eighth eclogue of Virgil, the conviction would not down that the piece had been laboriously built around the passage for three trumpets played in the distance, with its accompanying song from the English horn and pianoforte. That music sounded antique, if one must have it so, and sounded, moreover, like the evocation of an enchanter's wand, but much of that with which it is associated must wait till Debussy has completed his education of the Philistines before it can boast of being understood and admired."

Of Mr. Converse's "Dramatic Scenes," the Sun says: "Joan of Arc has been a source of inspiration to artists in many lands. That she might find a fitting apostrophizer in music was undoubtedly the hope of those who sat them down last night to listen to the suite of Mr. Converse. The first movement, indeed, promised well. It is a gay and gallant movement in which the happy freedom of the peasantry is fairly well depicted by musical means not unfamiliar to the experienced concertgoer, but none the less skilfully employed. There is a serious contrasting theme in this movement, afterward heard in some carefully prepared developments which undoubtedly signify the ardent devotion of the inspired maid. After that the flight of Mr. Converse's muse was close to old mother earth. Except in the use of the archaic hymn, 'Veni Creator,' there was nothing to breathe the spirit of the early fifteenth century, nothing to paint the sorrows of downtrodden France, nothing to chant the pride of perfidious Albion. The reverie might have been a comforting visitant to one of Millet's peasants as well as to Joan of Arc. The battle scene was just a musical hurly burly of the conventional sort, and by no means effective at that. The visions were slumbrous enough, and the summary of the maid's career in the last movement breathed nothing of that rare spirit which vowed that her life work was none of her own choosing, but was to be done in obedience to the call of the Most High.

If the emotional scheme of an artistic embodiment of the Maid of Orleans admits of anything at all, it certainly admits of the voicing of that celestial rapture which made her death glorious. But it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Mr. Converse found his inspiration in Mr. MacKaye's play and not in one of the most singular and characteristic individual survivals of the spirit which swept through Europe in the tumultuous passion of the Crusades.

There is good scoring in Mr. Converse's composition, but in these days that is expected of every man who employs the orchestra for the expression of his ideas. The work is not at all absorbing to the thoughtful hearer, whether regarded as the expression of a great idea or as mere music. Mr. Converse has written things that will probably wear longer than this."

Mr. Loeffler's work is an attempt to reproduce in music something of the feeling of certain lines in the eighth eclogue of Virgil. It was first conceived as a piece of chamber music in 1901. Afterward it was remade for two pianos and three trumpets and finally took its present form. The poetry on which it is founded represents a Thessalian girl endeavoring to lure back her lover and the key of the whole is found in the refrain, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home."

Let us confess to an inability to fathom the entire scheme of this composition. There is a splendid display of sonorous orchestration, and the piano part is written in such a manner as to give it strong individuality and call for high skill on the part of the player. All the resources of modern dissonant harmony are called into use in the course of the composition and the acrid chords of the dominant French school are heard in plenty. Nevertheless there are passages in which the old fashioned fundamentals of music are employed, and as usual in such cases these are the episodes which provide the most substantial pleasure to the hearer.

The English horn sings the songs of the Thessalian girl with exquisite accents. Here indeed the composer has given us a mood both pastoral and archaic, an atmosphere at once tender and remote. The piano, we take it, represents the palpitating girl herself, while the three obbligato trumpets heard behind the scenes carry to us the voice of the distant and hesitating Daphnis.

In his use of these three trumpets Mr. Loeffler has accomplished something delightful and has given us an uncommon musical effect. Last night the sounds of the instruments were conveyed into the auditorium through a telephone armed with a horn. The tonal result was something wonderfully beautiful. The distance was perfectly simulated and the voices of the brass instruments acquired a mysterious and mellow quality quite indescribable. But let us admit that in the portions of the composition which intervened between these episodes there was much that appeared inexplicable. The Thessalian girl seemed to be lost in a tremendous outpouring of orchestral splendor altogether modern in method and spirit. There was nothing of the soul of Virgil or his eclogue in these passages. They smacked rather of the French theatre of today."

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 20, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

LOEFFLER'S AND CONVERSE'S MUSIC IN NEW YORK

"A Pagan Poem" and "Jeanne d'Arc" Played for the First Time There by the Symphony Orchestra — The Reviewers' Impressions—Dr. Muck Conducting Again —And Still Those Programmes—Mrs. Stevens's Recital — Miss Nethersole's Striking Magda—Ben Jonson's "Bartholomew Fair" to Be Acted Here Next Month—The Press Agent as Hero—Dr. Muck's Future—Other News of the Day

After reluctant absence in Baltimore and Washington, Dr. Muck was able to conduct again at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night in New York with the "All-American," and indeed "All-Bostonian," programme with which, seemingly he would compliment American composers and American audiences. It began with the "Dramatic Scenes" that Mr. Converse has rearranged and rewritten from his music for Percy MacKaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc"; proceeded with Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and ended with MacDowell's "Indian" suite. Mr. Loeffler's piece was played for the first time in New York; and Mr. Converse's has been heard there only in its original form of incidental music in the theatre and under the clouding conditions that dim such music there. MacDowell's suite, on the other hand, was altogether familiar and by no less than three repetitions in Carnegie Hall this very winter. As for Dr. Muck, hampered as he was by his neuritic right arm, the Sun says succinctly this morning: "The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was superb, and Dr. Muck conducted with his customary insight. He was made to understand that the audience was sorry to part with him."

"Let us confess," the Sun proceeds, "to an inability to fathom the entire scheme of Mr. Loeffler's composition. There is a splendid display of sonorous orchestration, and the piano part is written in such a manner as to give it strong individuality and call for high skill on the part of the player. All the resources of modern dissonant harmony are called into use in the course of the piece, and the acrid chords of the dominant French school are heard in plenty. Nevertheless there are passages in which the old fashioned fundamentals of music are employed, and as usual in such cases these are the episodes which provide the most substantial pleasure to the hearer. The English horn sings the songs of the Thessalian girl with exquisite accents. Here indeed the composer has given us a mood both pastoral and archaic, an atmosphere at once tender and remote. The piano, we take it, represents the palpitating girl herself, while the three obbligato trumpets heard behind the scenes carry to us the voice of the distant and hesitating Daphnis. In his use of these three trumpets Mr. Loeffler has accomplished something delightful and has given us an uncommon musical effect. Last night the sounds of the instruments were conveyed into the auditorium through a telephone armed with a horn. The tonal result was something wonderfully beautiful. The distance was perfectly simulated and the voices of the brass instruments acquired a mysterious and mellow quality quite indescribable. But let us admit that in the portions of the composition which intervened between these episodes there was much that appeared inexplicable. The Thessalian girl seemed to be lost in a tremendous outpouring of orchestral splendor altogether modern in method and spirit. There was nothing of the soul of Virgil or his eclogue in these passages. They smacked rather of the French theatre of today."

"Of course, we must have the new," continues the Tribune, "and have them (sic) as Mr. Loeffler gave them (sic) to us last night in his 'Pagan Poem,' with its moments of exquisite imaginative as well as sensuous beauty. These moments, however, were episodic, and while listening to the composition, which we were invited to hear as music inspired by the eighth eclogue of Virgil, the conviction would not down that the piece had been laboriously built around the passage for three trumpets played in the distance, with its accompanying song from the English horn and pianoforte. That music sounded antique, if one must have it so, and sounded, moreover, like the evocation of an enchanter's wand, but much of that with which it is associated must wait till Debussy has completed his education of the Philistines before it can boast of being understood and admired."

Of Mr. Converse's "Dramatic Scenes," the Sun says: "Joan of Arc has been a source of inspiration to artists in many lands. That she might find a fitting apostrophizer in music was undoubtedly the hope of those who sat them down last night to listen to the suite of Mr. Converse. The first movement, indeed, promised well. It is a gay and gallant movement in which the happy freedom of the peasantry is fairly well depicted by musical means not unfamiliar to the experienced concertgoer, but none the less skilfully employed. There is a serious contrasting theme in this movement, afterward heard in some carefully prepared developments which undoubtedly signify the ardent devotion of the inspired maid. After that the flight of Mr. Converse's muse was close to old mother earth. Except in the use of the archaic hymn, 'Veni Creator,' there was nothing to breathe the spirit of the early fifteenth century, nothing to paint the sorrows of downtrodden France, nothing to chant the pride of perfidious Albion. The reverie might have been a comforting visitant to one of Millet's peasants as well as to Joan of Arc. The battle scene was just a musical hurly burly of the conventional sort, and by no means effective at that. The visions were slumbrous enough, and the summary of the maid's career in the last movement breathed nothing of that rare spirit which vowed that her life work was none of her own choosing, but was done in obedi[ence] to the call of the Most High. [em]bodiment of the Maid of Orleans admits of anything at all, it certainly admits of the voicing of that celestial rapture which made her death glorious. But it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Mr. Converse found his inspiration in Mr. MacKaye's play and not in one of the most singular and characteristic individual survivals of the spirit which swept through Europe in the tumultuous passion of the Crusades. There is good scoring in Mr. Converse's composition, but in these days that is expected of every man who employs the orchestra for the expression of his ideas. The work is not at all absorbing to the thoughtful hearer, whether regarded as the expression of a great idea or as mere music. Mr. Converse has written things that will probably wear longer than this."

The Tribune adds of the same piece: "Mr. Converse's suite was obviously made to save his music from the fate of Mr. MacKaye's play. We fear that it will not prove an exception to the rule which time seems to have established for music of its character. Some of it—the second movement, for instance—has independent beauty whose appreciation does not call for the exercise of a fancy warmed by the incidents of the drama or the familiar tale of the Maid of Orleans; some of it will appeal in vain in spite of its dramatic or poetic association. What may be said of it in general in the way of approbation applies to its naturalness—conventionality, if the extremists prefer the word—of utterance at a time when there is a prevalent notion that the only new music worth listening to is that which subjects the old and accepted elements of the art to violence. Yet there are those—and they are not necessarily all Philistines (though the apellation is coming into good repute) who think with Selden and Goldsmith that many old things are most worthy of affection—old scales, old harmonies, old instrumental combinations even."

Dr. Muck and His Programmes

To the Editor of the Transcript:

It seems to me that your two correspondents of recent date who have written about Dr. Muck's programmes overlook the fact that the purpose of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not to furnish a maximum of pleasure to "nine-tenths of the audience," but to afford a medium for the cultivation of a liberal and catholic taste, for the acquaintance of worthy music by contemporaries of acknowledged capacity; to help on the progress of music, as well as to nurture respect and admiration for the classics. It is a comparatively easy task to please an audience; to elevate or educate it is not only ungrateful but thankless. Dr. Muck, as is well known, is not in sympathy with much of modern music. All honor to him, therefore, in that his sense of impartiality and of educational necessity has had more weight with him than his personal predilections.

MUSIC LOVER

March 20.

In view of the speculation about Dr. Muck's future, with which various newspapers in other cities are amusing themselves and their readers, it is only the truth to say that the conductor returns to Berlin to fulfill the long contract under which he is engaged at the opera house there; and that no human being knows or can foretell, what he will do after the distant expiration of that contract. Other than this contract, there are no "understandings" of any sort as to his future in Germany or in America, but the probability is, if the German newspapers speak truly, that next year, besides his work at the opera house, he will succeed the departed Weingartner as the conductor of the symphony concerts of the Court Orchestra.

Mr. Wendling, the concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, was well received by the audiences at Washington and Baltimore when he conducted on Tuesday and Wednesday at the concerts there of the Boston Orchestra. By all critical accounts, moreover, he acquitted himself well in a task that was almost new to him.

From NEW YORK HERALD,

Address New York City.

Date

'BOSTON SYMPHONY" IN AMERICAN MUSIC

Closing the present evening series, a concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. It was also one of the farewells of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra. His final farewell will take place at the Saturday matinee concert of the orchestra here.

Furthermore, last night's programme was devoted to American composers and contained two novelties and one old favorite. It began with a novelty, Mr. Frederick S. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," a suite of five dramatic scenes. This music was composed as incidental to Mr. Percy Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc," but the composer amplified and revamped it until it assumed its present shape. It is disappointing music. The chief interest lies in the beginning, and then it drags its way rather slowly through the four remaining movements. It sounds like music that might pass muster in a theatre, backed by scenery and flanked by action and dialogue, but in the concert hall it will scarcely earn for its composer everlasting fame.

Then came Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," a work also new to New York. It was inspired by some verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, but the composition does not follow the text save in a free trend. The music is wonderfully poetic and admirably effective.

To give the trumpet players off stage the proper cue a telephone was hung on the wall at the side and a paper funnel, resembling a megaphone, was inserted as a mouthpiece. This composition enlists the services of a pianist, which was ably assumed by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The final number was McDowell's "Indian Suite," a composition popular and well beloved. The playing of the orchestra was again above reproach and Dr. Muck was warmly applauded by an enormous audience. He received as a present a wreath, which he blushingly carried off the stage.

[172]

TIMES,

New York City.

MAR 20 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of American Music at the Last Evening Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes now on its last visit this season, and the two concerts—that of last evening and that of to-morrow afternoon—are the last that Dr. Muck will conduct here. There was recognition of this fact in the prolonged applause that greeted him as he appeared upon the platform last evening, and again after the first number, when a large wreath was handed up to him. The concert was devoted to the works of American composers, two of which were played for the first time in New York. These were F. S. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, Opus 23, and C. M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Opus 14. The programme was completed by Edward MacDowell's "Indian" suite for orchestra, Opus 48.

It would be difficult to imagine from three compositions the characteristics of an "American school," so widely apart are they in aim and in execution. Yet they are all of a quality, even a distinction, that no American music lover need be ashamed of. Mr. Converse's music is a suite arranged from incidental music written for Percy Mackaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc," yet it is much more than incidental music as that term is commonly used. There are leading motives, which represent different characters, situations, and emotional phases of the drama, to use his own words, and by their use he attempted to build up an artistic incidental music with a unity of purpose and expression entirely lacking in the fragmentary, unrelated, and often meaningless and irrelevant music that is used in theatrical representations. Such music should have substance and importance enough for performance by itself, and Mr. Converse's, in the form of the five "dramatic scenes" in which he presents it, has such substance and importance.

These are entitled, respectively, "In Domrémy," "Pastoral Reverie," "Battle Hymn," "Night Vision," "The Maid of God." The music is ingratiating, charming, largely pictorial in its purpose, yet potent in evoking moods and suggesting a spiritual sympathy with the dramatic scenes which it illustrates. Mr. Converse has an abundance of melodic invention and skill in the use of his material to develop an artistic fabric—skill not only in thematic treatment, but also in the use of the orchestra and of orchestral colors. He has made good use in heightening the suggestiveness of his music, of old French folk-song, and of the ancient hymn, "Veni creator spiritus." The former occurs in the first movement "In Domrémy," the latter in the stirring "Battle Hymn." This first movement and the last are the most elaborately developed of the five.

The "Pastoral Reverie" is a graceful elucidation of the idea signified in its title, with the pastoral tones of the English horn. The last, "The Maid of God," giving "an emotional résumé of her whole career," is the strongest portion of the work, and the climax to which it is developed, the martial strains of the pageantry of the King's coronation, is wrought with fine skill.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" is suggested by a portion of one of Virgil's Eclogues, a love song and a love incantation of a Thessalian maiden endeavoring to bring back her truant lover. Mr. Loeffler has reworked this composition a number of times, as he has so much else of his music that has had public performance. It was originally a piece for chamber music, was remolded and treated more symphonically, and finally attained its present shape, which is for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, the trumpets being heard at different distances off the stage, and only at the close with the rest of the orchestra.

This statement of the material means employed suggests that the composer has made elaborate experiments in instrumental timbres in the piece, and such is the case. The pianoforte part is difficult and elaborate, yet is treated essentially as a part of the ensemble. Most noteworthy is the use of the three distant trumpets playing in strange and dissonant harmonies faintly heard. With these has gone a marvelously skillful use of the orchestra, of all its colors and their combinations, and there are effects here that are of strange power and subtle effectiveness. The substance of Mr. Loeffler's music is surcharged with a high and fertile imagination. It is far from being an exact translation into tones of Virgil's poem.

The music has no servile dependence upon the literary programme, nor does it follow it page by page. It is, however, potent in suggestion of the poem, of the crying amorousness of the pagan maiden. There is a note of sensuousness in it. There are gloom and despair, and there is frantic, almost savage, rejoicing. Obviously pleasing in its material and substance the music is not.

There are passages that may well puzzle and baffle even the sympathetic listener on a first hearing. The harmonic structure that Mr. Loeffler has built up takes him into the strange and not always comfortable regions of dissonance to which all ears are not inured. His themes are not immediately to be grasped, nor are the skill and certainty of touch with which the contrapuntal structure to be at once fully appreciated, though they can hardly be overlooked by the attentive listener. That it is the work of a musician of consummate powers is evident, and there are pages of the keenest and most poignant beauty.

Dr. Muck played all this music, as well as MacDowell's Indian suite, familiar through repeated hearings in New York, with the utmost sincerity and enthusiasm. It is one of the traits of this remarkable master that he conducts everything as if it were for him, at this particular moment, the one thing he most believed in. The orchestra played superbly. In Mr. Loeffler's piece Mr. Heinrich Gebhard took the pianoforte obbligato with remarkable skill and insight. The other obbligato players were not mentioned, but Mr. Longy's performance on the English horn was unmistakable.

From

Address

Date MAR 30 1908

Bei dem gestern Abend in der Carnegie Hall stattgehabten letzten Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wurde Dr. Karl Muck, der berühmte Leiter desselben, durch Ueberreichung reichlicher Blumenspenden, sowie anderer Geschenke geehrt. Man bedauerte es allgemein, daß der illustre Musiker Amerika schon so rasch verläßt; er schiffte sich bereits heute Mittag auf dem Hamburger Dampfer [illegible]

SUN,

New York City.

MAR 20 1908

AMERICAN MUSIC PERFORMED

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S LAST EVENING CONCERT.

Frederick S. Converse Discourses in Many Tones of "Joan of Arc," and Charles Martin Loeffler Translates an Eclogue of Virgil—MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

Dr. Carl Muck, making his final appearance last night at an evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, elected to present three compositions by American composers. These were Frederick S. Converse's dramatic scenes for orchestra entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for orchestra, piano, English horn and three trumpets obligati, and Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite." The first two were new to local music lovers, but the last is an old friend.

Mr. Converse's music was made originally in 1906 for small orchestra and was intended for performance with the play of "Percy Mackaye," enacted by Mr. Sothern, Miss Marlowe and their associates. In the winter of 1906 and 1907 Mr. Converse rewrote this music for large orchestra and last summer he rewrote it again. It is in the general form of a suite and has five movements, with these titles, "In Domremy," "Pastoral Reverie," "Battle Hymn," "Night Visions" and "The Maid of God."

Joan of Arc has been a source of inspiration to artists in many lands. That she might find a fitting apostrophizer in music was undoubtedly the hope of those who sat them down last night to listen to the suite of Mr. Converse. The first movement, indeed, promised well. It is a gay and gallant movement in which the happy freedom of the peasantry is fairly well depicted by musical means not unfamiliar to the experienced concertgoer but none the less skilfully employed. There is a serious contrasting theme in this movement afterward heard in some carefully prepared developments which undoubtedly signify the ardent devotion of the inspired maid.

After that the flight of Mr. Converse's muse was close to old mother earth. Except in the use of the archaic hymn "Veni Creator" there was nothing to breathe the spirit of the early fifteenth century, nothing to paint the sorrows of downtrodden France, nothing to chant the pride of perfidious Albion. The reverie might have been a comforting visitant to one of Millet's peasants as well as to Joan of Arc.

The battle scene was just a musical hurly burly of the conventional sort, and by no means effective at that. The visions were slumbrous enough, and the summary of the maid's career in the last movement breathed nothing of that rare spirit which vowed that her life work was none of her own choosing, but was to be done in obedience to the call of the Most High.

If the emotional scheme of an artistic embodiment of the Maid of Orleans admits of anything at all, it certainly admits of the voicing of that celestial rapture which made her death glorious. But it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Mr. Converse found his inspiration in Mr. Mackaye's play and not in one of the most singular and characteristic individual survivals of the spirit which swept through Europe in the tumultuous passion of the Crusades.

There is good scoring in Mr. Converse's composition, but in these days that is expected of every man who employs the orchestra for the expression of his ideas. The work is not at all absorbing to the thoughtful hearer, whether regarded as the expression of a great idea or as mere music. Mr. Converse has written things that will probably wear longer than this.

Mr. Loeffler's work is an attempt to reproduce in music something of the feeling of certain lines in the eighth eclogue of Virgil. It was first conceived as a piece of chamber music in 1901. Afterward it was remade for two pianos and three trumpets and finally took its present form. The poetry on which it is founded represents a Thessalian girl endeavoring to lure back her lover and the key of the whole is found in the refrain, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home."

Let us confess to an inability to fathom the entire scheme of this composition. There is a splendid display of sonorous orchestration, and the piano part is written in such a manner as to give it strong individuality and call for high skill on the part of the player. All the resources of modern dissonant harmony are called into use in the course of the composition and the acrid chords of the dominant French school are heard in plenty. Nevertheless there are passages in which the old fashioned fundamentals of music are employed, and as usual in such cases these are the episodes which provide the most substantial pleasure to the hearer.

The English horn sings the songs of the Thessalian girl with exquisite accents. Here indeed the composer has given us a mood both pastoral and archaic, an atmosphere at once tender and remote. The piano, we take it, represents the palpitating girl herself, while the three obligato trumpets heard behind the scenes carry to us the voice of the distant and hesitating Daphnis.

In his use of these three trumpets Mr. Loeffler has accomplished something delightful and has given us an uncommon musical effect. Last night the sounds of ...admit that in the portions of ... position which intervened between ... episodes there was much that ap... inexplicable. The Thessalian girl ... to be lost in a tremendous outpour... of orchestral splendor altogether mod... in method and spirit. There was noth... of the soul of Virgil or his eclogue in ... passages. They smacked rather of ... French theatre of to-day.

It will not be difficult for any experienced ... goer to understand that the ad... music of Mr. MacDowell's "Indian ..." was heard to great advantage after ... two uncertain works. The perfor... of the orchestra throughout the ... was superb and Dr. Muck con... with his customary insight. He ... made to understand that the audience ... sorry to part with him.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

Press

MAR 20 1908

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Die Bostoner kamen uns gestern amerikanisch. Sie führten uns drei Tondichtungen vor, die auf amerikanischem Boden entstanden sind und Amerikaner — mit und ohne Bindestrich — zu Vätern haben. Der Amerikaner „mit" ist der Elsässer Charles Martin Loeffler, der sich als Geiger einen Namen gemacht hat und eine Zeitlang der stellvertretende Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gewesen ist; heute lebt er in Medfield, Mass. Die beiden „waschechten" Amerikaner sind der unlängst verstorbene Edward MacDowell und Frederick S. Converse, der gleich Loeffler dem „Bay-State"-zur Zierde gereicht.

Converse's Werk, das die Bostoner gestern zum ersten Male spielten, betitelt sich „Jeanne d'Arc" und führt den Untertitel: Dramatische Scenen für Orchester. Ursprünglich als Begleitmusik zum gleichnamigen Drama von Percy Mackaye geschrieben, arbeitete der Komponist später das Werk in eine Suite um und richtete es für großes Orchester ein. In dieser Form gelangte es vor etwa einem Jahre zur Uraufführung. Seitdem wurde die Partitur einer Revision unterzogen und so ausgestaltet, wie wir sie gestern interpretirt bekamen. In fünf Abtheilungen zieht das Leben der Heldenjungfrau an unserem Ohre vorüber. Zuerst die Idylle der in Domremy verbrachten Jugendzeit. Wir hören die Vesper-Musik, wir hören Johanna's Traum, ein Liebeslied, gesungen von einem stillen Verehrer des Mädchens, klingt hinein, auch ein altes Lothringer Volkslied taucht auf in diesem Präludium, das man auch eine Ouverture nennen kann, da in den stillen Frieden aus der Ferne gedämpfter Kriegslärm schallt. Ganz Idylle und Träumerei und Hirtenleben ist der zweite Theil. Im dritten aber geht's ernstlich los.

Unter den Klängen des kirchlichen Hymnus „Veni Creator" zieht man kampfgemuth in die Schlacht, deren Getöse das fromme Lied übertönt, bis endlich der Sieg errungen ist und die Trompeten jubelnd und triumphirend der alten Weise wieder zu ihrem Rechte verhelfen. No. 4: Nacht-Vision. Die Jungfrau von Orleans schläft auf mondbeglänzter Flur, unbestimmte Geräusche der Nacht bringen aus dem nahen Lager herüber. Es schleicht sich der Herzog von Alençon an das heimlich geliebte Mündel heran und küßt voll Inbrunst die Hand der müden Heldin. Aber St. Michael, der wehrhafte Erzengel, erscheint dem Liebesbedürftigen und giebt ihm zu verstehen, daß die Jungfrau im Schutze des Himmels steht — und betrübt, aber als Sieger über den Versucher, zieht der Herzog sich zurück. Im letzten Bilde sehen wir Johanna als die zum Flammentod Verurtheilte. Die Priester beten für das Heil ihrer armen Seele, und nochmals zieht das Leben der Aermsten in Tönen, bald sanft, bald kriegerisch, an uns vorüber bis zum Klimax, dem höchsten Momente in der Karriere der Jungfrau: der Krönung des Königs von Frankreich in Rheims. Aber der Traum geht zu Ende, die brechliche Wirklichkeit ist wieder da. Während die Priester das Kyrie Eleison singen, vollzieht sich der Schlußakt der Tragödie. Den Leib der Befreierin Frankreich's haben die lodernden Flammen verzehrt, ihre reine Seele aber fliegt empor zum himmlischen Vaterlande.

Dem Gesagten brauchen wir wohl nicht ausdrücklich hinzuzufügen, daß Converse zu den Programmmusikern gehört, und zwar zu jener Abart, die es nicht verschmäht, ab und zu eine ausgiebige Anleihe bei Vorgängern aufzunehmen. Aber er schöpft auch aus Eigenem und bemüht sich ehrlich, originell zu sein, wobei es ihm allerdings passirt, daß er manchmal des Guten zu viel thut und bizarr wirkt. Allerlei ...liche Instrumente, wie Glockenspiel, ..., Glocken, Triangel und anderes ...zeug führt er in's Treffen, um ...ordentliche Effekte zu erzielen, viel... es aber beim guten Wollen, und ... zeigt sich nur in den ..., die durch ...

Sang) nennt Loeffler sein Werk, das gestern ebenfalls zum erstenmale in New York aufgeführt worden ist. Er hat es dem Andenken des verstorbenen Herrn Gustav Schirmer gewidmet. Ursprünglich war es als Kammermusik gedacht, nachträglich aber erhielt es sein jetziges Gepräge, das von der Schablone der üblichen Orchestrirung insoferne abweicht, als Pianoforte, Englisch Horn und drei Trompeten obligat sind. Die Verwendung des Klaviers im Orchester erinnert an d'Indy. Der Komponist hat die Anregung zu dieser Arbeit aus der achten Ekloge Vergil's erhalten; das Liebeslied der thessalischen Maid hat es ihm besonders angethan und ihn inspirirt. Aber er verwahrt sich gegen die Unterstellung, als hätte er die Verse Vergil's in Musik umsetzen wollen.

Wenn man das Werk gehört hat, glaubt man dies dem Komponisten auf's Wort. Richard Strauß ist ein Waisenknabe gegen Loeffler, sofern die „Aufmachung" in Betracht kommt, und man kann ohne weiteres hinzufügen, daß der Schöpfer des „Heiden-Sanges" es mit den Modernsten der Modernen getrost aufnehmen kann in der Erzeugung von Geräuschen, die nach altväterischer Anschauung alles Andere, nur nicht Musik sind. Ein „Heiden-Lärm" ist dieser „Heiden-Sang", oftmals ein Tongewirre, in welchem man vergebens nach den Faden der Ariadne sucht. Der Klavierpart, den gestern Heinrich Gebhard übernommen hatte, soll, zeitweilig wenigstens, über das Chaos dominiren, aber gegen die Wucht des Orchesterkörpers konnte er unmöglich aufkommen. Mag sein, daß das Werk gewinnt, wenn man es öfters hört. Aber für's erste Mal wirkt es direkt brutal in seiner inneren Zerfahrenheit.

Die bekannte „Indianische Suite" von MacDowell war nach dem Vorausgegangenen ein wahres Labsal für's Ohr. Zumal sie vom Orchester, dem sie bekanntlich gewidmet ist, mit Hingebung und virtuos gespielt wurde.

Dr. Carl Muck dirigirte gestern mit mehr Elan, als gewöhnlich und bemühte sich erfolgreich, in die verworrensten Stellen des Loeffler'schen Werkes einige Klarheit zu bringen. Er erhielt zum Abschied — am nächsten Samstag Nachmittag werden wir ihm zum letzten Male an der Spitze der Bostoner sehen — einen Lorbeerkranz und eine recht herzliche Ovation.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

Address New York City.

MAR 20 1908

AMERICAN PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Converse, Loeffler and MacDowell Represented by Compositions.

The first of the fifth pair of concerts given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place last night at Carnegie Hall, and was very largely attended.

As a compliment to the land in which he has lately been adding to his laurels, Dr. Muck had arranged a programme devoted entirely to American composers.

Much as the distinguished German must be admired as a conductor, his judgment in the selection of programmes is not infallible. Last night, by including Mr. Loeffler's so-called "Pagan Poem" in his scheme he bored his audience and did little to advance the cause of our American musicians.

It is unjust to the memory of the great poet to pretend (as Mr. Loeffler does) that his composition was inspired by Virgil. There is no inspiration of any kind in the work, which, except for a few moments here and there, is insufferably pretentious, and, on a first hearing, appears meaningless.

The tone coloring, the harmonic combinations, in this "poem" at moments suggested that Mr. Loeffler had paid considerable attention to Debussy. But Debussy is eloquent. He is expressive. He really is what Mr. Loeffler hopes to be, a poet, who at moments can be pagan.

In this "poem" Mr. Loeffler is bewildering when he is not blatant.

There was more poetry and more pagan sentiment in the beautiful "Pastoral Reverie" of Mr. Converse (forming part of the five scenes from his "Jeanne d'Arc" music) than in the whole of Mr. Loeffler's work. How Mr. Converse came to put paganism into a composition connected with the most Christian heroine is a mystery. But it is there. And it is in his "Battle Hymn." The "Jeanne d'Arc" music is not all as charming as that "Pastoral Reverie."

MacDowell's well-known "Indian" suite brought the concert to an enjoyable end.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

MAR 21 1908

DR. KARL MUCK HONORED.

Showered with Gifts at Boston Orchestra's Final Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and final concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. It was by far the largest attended and most enthusiastically encored concert the orchestra has given in this city. At the close Dr. Karl Muck, the leader, was showered with flowers and gifts.

Dr. Muck, who has led the orchestra all through the season, will sail for Germany after the last matinee to-day. On account of an injury to his right arm he has been compelled to wield the baton in his left hand during the New York concerts.

[173]

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

MAR 20 1908

ALL-AMERICAN MUSIC DOESN'T DRAW A CROWD

Boston Orchestra Plays Compositions by Resident Writers.

MAYBE LOEFFLER GAVE SCARE

New Yorkers Not Used to New Man's New Music—Fine Playing in Carnegie Hall.

American music apparently does not exert a great attraction on friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night, at the season's final evening concert of our neighborly band, Dr. Muck offered a whole programme of music by so-called Americans, yet the audience in Carnegie Hall was not as large as usual. What can this mean? Are American music lovers in New York prejudiced against the creations of their own countrymen? Or can it be the audiences of the Boston Symphony are composed for the most part of men and women of foreign blood?

It is possible persons were scared away by the announcement of a new work by Loeffler, who shared the programme with Converse and MacDowell. This remarkable composer has found little favor with the cultured supporters of the Kneisel Quartet, so maybe the Symphony audiences uptown, just as gentle and proper and well-behaved and fashionably dressed, surely, as the lovers of salon classics in Mendelssohn Hall, also are mentally puckered by Loeffler's instrumental alum. Why, even the noble sonorites of Anton Bruckner, one of the really great in music, irritated the nerves of those good citizens whom Gericke, always perfectly proper, taught how to listen to music!

How absurd, though, to call Loeffler musically an American. As if a decade or so spent in this country, as if citizenship, or even language, signifies in art! Blood alone counts, and Charles Martin Loeffler was born in 1861 in Alsace. Loeffler is no more an American that Debussy.

There was no sensible or valid reason for putting the Alsatian's "Pagan Poem" on the same programme with Converse's dramatic scenes, "Jeanne d'Arc," and MacDowell's "Indian" suite. There was ample intrinsic reason, however, for producing the work here, and one may hope that there will be further opportunities to listen to its message. A single hearing gives only a scant idea of a composition made for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligato.

Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" originally was written for pianoforte, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass. Five years after its creation he remodeled and amplified it, treating it more symphonically. The tone-poem was inspired by verses from the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, particularly those lines which tell in the fantastic imagery of the poet, of "the love incantations of a Thessalian, who by the aid of magical spells endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant wooer."

While Loeffler does not follow literally Virgil's verse, he gives an exceedingly imaginative, poetically conceived and finely wrought impressionist picture of such reflected feelings and moods as might be aroused in tones by the reading of it. Of melody in the conventional sense there is, of course, little if any. The thematic material is significant rather through its harmonic flavor and instrumental coloring than through beauty of melodic line. Naturally, there is not the dramatic strength and biting force of "The Death of Tintagiles," which still holds its own among Loeffler's works for originality and inspiration.

There is, on the other hand, a more refined interpretation of abstract and impalpable sensations and a greater fertility and refinement in instrumentation. The piano part, played excellently by Heinrich Gebhardt, is woven beautifully into the orchestral web. Frequently, however, it seems to replace merely the harp. The effect of the trumpets behind the scenes, proclaiming "The burden of the sorceress," "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home," was beautiful in effect.

There will be better opportunities, no doubt, to gauge the value of "A Pagan Poem," its strong leaning upon Debussy, however, its unmistakable affinities to "Pelleas et Melisande"; its application even of the French composer's mannerisms, are not in its favor. It is considered by Loeffler enthusiasts his most successful work. Little doubt it is his most mature orchestral message. Yet to us it lacks the spontaneity, the directness, the convincing power of a truly vital utterance. A welcome work; an exceedingly interesting one. But not the inspiration of genius.

In Converse's music there is not much to arouse enthusiasm. The themes have little distinction or originality; the workmanship has little of compensatory value. The fourth movement, "Night Vision," is orchestrated effectively. The final movement, "The Maid of God," has a few good moments. On the whole, these scenes, originally composed as incidental music for Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc," give a weak description of the subject. Of the MacDowell music it is unnecessary to speak at this time. The orchestra played exceedingly well under the guidance of Muck, who conducted with his left hand for a large part of the evening.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

MAR 20 1908

Boston Symphony at Carnegie

FOR his final appearance in New York at an evening concert with the Boston Symphony, Dr. Muck was given a veritable ovation by an enthusiastic audience in Carnegie Hall last night. The great band from Boston has seldom played more brilliantly than it did last night under Dr. Muck's leadership.

The programme was devoted entirely to modern music. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," originally written for Mackaye's play of that name, has since been amplified into five dramatic scenes. Of these the first and second, depicting the Maid of God in her early days at Domremy, were the most appealing.

Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," built on an episode from Virgil, and MacDowell's familiar Indian suite completed the pro-

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of Season Led by Karl Wendling, Concert Master.

When programs were opened by the large audience that packed the New National Theater yesterday afternoon to hear the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra little slips fluttered to the floor. They bore the legend "Dr. Muck is indisposed. Mr. Wendling will conduct." It was learned that Dr. Muck's indisposition arose from trouble with the nerves of his right arm. Mr. Wendling, who is concert master and first violin of the orchestra, is by no means unaccustomed to conducting the organization, and he filled Dr. Muck's place most acceptably. The audience was naturally disappointed, since the occasion would have been otherwise in the nature of a farewell to the retiring conductor, who is about to return to Germany, his two years' engagement terminating.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat, opus 60, as announced in Sunday's Star, was the foundation of the afternoon's music, although by some error the program had the sixth symphony listed, with a long analysis, which kept some of the audience watching for a tremendous thunderstorm, which never came, although every time the kettle drummer became more than usually busy the tiptoes of expectation were put to work. The symphony, with its quaint and sometimes plaintive melodies, was beautifully interpreted by Mr. Wendling. This composition, though obscured somewhat by the fame of its magnificent brethren, is charming, and has a grandeur also, though different in kind from that of the more majestic productions of Beethoven.

The fanciful Strauss composition, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," was the second number. This familiar work was selected, possibly, to show off the paces of the orchestra. If so, it was successful, for the music went with a verve and dash which would have pleased the madcap scamp himself. Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," an opera in Wagnerian form with a libretto by Catulle Mendes, who imitated the Wagnerian plots—or borrowed from a similar source—closed the program. One comment on the overture was that Chabrier shows all the faults of Wagner and not much of his dignity and splendor, but the composition is, at least, distinctive, though it be of a school. The closing passages elicited great applause.

During its season—the twenty-seventh in Washington—the orchestra has played, in addition to yesterday's program, two symphonies, Brahms No. 2 and Mendelssohn No. 3, with d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy and Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." Three concertos have been given—McDowell's No. 2 in D minor, Mendelssohn's in E minor and Rubinstein's No. 4 in D minor. The overtures have been those to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," Lalo's "The King of Ys" and Schumann's "Genoveva." Other composers represented were Bach and Rimsky-Korsakoff. The soloists were Paderewski, Kreisler and Mme. Carreno.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

BULLETIN

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Final Concert This Season and Dr. Muck's Last Appearance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its twenty-third season in Philadelphia to a brilliant close last night. With no soloist on the program as an extraneous drawing card, the large audience which filled the Academy of Music was a tribute pure and simple to this admirably-balanced compact, skillful and unisonous body of instrumentalists and their conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Muck, because of a painful attack of neuritis in his right forearm, was suffering considerable pain and was forced to wield his baton for the most part with his left hand.

The program, while an exceedingly interesting one, was not as well "built" with regard to contrast as might have been wished, McDowell's "Indian Suite" and a "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, being highly characteristic music which had better been placed farther apart. These and the symphony, Beethoven's "Pastoral," were played in a fashion made possible only through that sufficiently long association by which this famous corps of musicians have acquired a well-nigh perfect unison of spirit, intuition, feeling and expression in orchestral artistry. The familiar "Pastoral" symphony (No. 6), with which the concert opened, was beautifully interpreted. In the "Indian Suite," which followed, the lamented Edward Alexander MacDowell's marvellous capabilities in depicting moods and expressing a poem in sound were most artistically illustrated by the orchestra, which played with vigor and vividness the variants of Indian melodies which appealed so powerfully to MacDowell's imaginative temperament the love song, the story of war, the dirge and the village festival of the American aborigines, and at its conclusion Dr. Muck and his musicians were applauded until the entire body of arists arose and bowed in acknowledgement. The Spanish Caprice was a succession of characteristic dances and songs, with varying fervor, animation and daintiness and throughout producing fine colorful effects.

...tonal result was some... wonderfully beautiful. The distance ... perfectly simulated and the voices ... brass instruments acquired a mys... and mellow quality quite indescriba...

But let us admit that in the portions of the composition which intervened between these episodes there was much that appeared inexplicable. The Thessalian girl seemed to be lost in a tremendous outpouring of orchestral splendor altogether modern in method and spirit. There was nothing of the soul of Virgil or his eclogue in these passages. They smacked rather of the French theatre of to-day.

It will not be difficult for any experienced concert goer to understand that the admirable music of Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" was heard to great advantage after these two uncertain works. The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was superb and Dr. Muck conducted with his customary insight. He was made to understand that the audience was sorry to part with him.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Die Bostoner kamen uns gestern amerikanisch. Sie führten uns drei Tondichtungen vor, die auf amerikanischem Boden entstanden sind und Amerikaner — mit und ohne Bindestrich — zu Vätern haben. Der Amerikaner „mit" ist der Elsässer Charles Martin Loeffler, der sich als Geiger einen Namen gemacht hat und eine Zeitlang der stellvertretende Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gewesen ist; heute lebt er in Medfield, Mass. Die beiden „waschechten" Amerikaner sind der unlängst verstorbene Edward MacDowell und Frederick S. Converse, der gleich Loeffler dem „Bay-State"-zur Zierde gereicht.

Converse's Werk, das die Bostoner gestern zum ersten Male spielten, betitelt sich „Jeanne d'Arc" und führt den Untertitel: Dramatische Scenen für Orchester. Ursprünglich als Begleitmusik zum gleichnamigen Drama von Percy Mackaye geschrieben, arbeitete der Komponist später das Werk in eine Suite um und richtete es für großes Orchester ein. In dieser Form gelangte es vor etwa einem Jahre zur Uraufführung. Seitdem wurde die Partitur einer Revision unterzogen und so ausgestaltet, wie wir sie gestern interpretirt bekamen. In fünf Abtheilungen zieht das Leben der Heldenjungfrau an unserem Ohre vorüber. Zuerst die Idylle der in Domremy verbrachten Jugendzeit. Wir hören die Vesper-Musik, wir hören Johanna's Traum, ein Liebeslied, gesungen von einem stillen Verehrer des Mädchens, klingt hinein, auch ein altes Lothringer Volkslied taucht auf in diesem Präludium, das man auch eine Ouverture nennen kann, da in den stillen Frieden aus der Ferne gedämpfter Kriegslärm schallt. Ganz Idylle und Träumerei und Hirtenleben ist der zweite Theil. Im dritten aber geht's ernstlich los.

Unter den Klängen des kirchlichen Hymnus „Veni Creator" zieht man kampfgemuth in die Schlacht, deren Getöse das fromme Lied übertönt, bis endlich der Sieg errungen ist und die Trompeten jubelnd und triumphirend der alten Weise wieder zu ihrem Rechte verhelfen. No. 4: Nacht-Vision. Die Jungfrau von Orleans schläft auf mondbeglänzter Flur, unbestimmte Geräusche der Nacht dringen aus dem nahen Lager herüber. Es schleicht sich der Herzog von Alençon an das heimlich geliebte Mündel heran und küßt voll Inbrunst die Hand der müden Heldin. Aber St. Michael, der wehrhafte Erzengel, erscheint dem Liebesbedürftigen und giebt ihm zu verstehen, daß die Jungfrau im Schutze des Himmels steht — und betrübt, aber als Sieger über den Versucher, zieht der Herzog sich zurück. Im letzten Bilde sehen wir Johanna als die zum Flammentod Verurtheilte. Die Priester beten für das Heil ihrer armen Seele, und nochmals zieht das Leben der Aermsten in Tönen, bald sanft, bald kriegerisch, an uns vorüber bis zum Klimax, dem höchsten Momente in der Karriere der Jungfrau: der Krönung des Königs v. Frankreich in Rheims. Aber der Traum geht zu Ende, die tödtliche Wirklichkeit ist wieder da. Während die Priester das Kyrie Eleison singen, vollzieht sich der Schlußakt der Tragödie. Den Leib der Befreierin Frankreich's haben die lodernden Flammen verzehrt, ihre reine Seele aber fliegt empor zum himmlischen Vaterlande.

Dem Gesagten brauchen wir wohl nicht ausdrücklich hinzuzufügen, daß Converse zu den Programmmusikern gehört, und zwar zu jener Abart, die es nicht verschmäht, ab und zu eine ausgiebige Anleihe bei Vorgängern aufzunehmen. Aber er schöpft auch aus Eigenem und bemüht sich ehrlich, originell zu sein, wobei es ihm allerdings passirt, daß er manchmal des Guten zu viel thut und bizarr wirkt. Alle möglichen Instrumente, wie Glockenspiel, Celesta, Glocken, Triangel und anderes Schlagzeug führt er in's Treffen, um außerordentliche Effekte zu erzielen, vielfach bleibt es aber beim guten Wollen, und wirkliche Eigenart zeigt sich nur in den [illegible] Ansätzen, die durchwegs [illegible] sind. Das heißt, die Schlußakkord bricht sie ab — und verg[illegible]ens wartet man auf das, was eigentlich noch kommen sollte. Das letzte Stück der Suite gefiel wohl am besten, im Großen und Ganzen machte das Werk einen [illegible]

Sang) nennt Loeffler sein Werk, das gestern ebenfalls zum erstenmale in New York aufgeführt worden ist. Er hat es dem Andenken des verstorbenen Herrn Gustav Schirmer gewidmet. Ursprünglich war es als Kammermusik gedacht, nachträglich aber erhielt es sein jetziges Gepräge, das von der Schablone der üblichen Orchestrirung insoferne abweicht, als Pianoforte, Englisch Horn und drei Trompeten obligat sind. Die Verwendung des Klaviers im Orchester erinnert an d'Indy. Der Komponist hat die Anregung zu dieser Arbeit aus der achten Ekloge Vergil's erhalten; das Liebeslied der thessalischen Maid hat es ihm besonders angethan und ihn inspirirt. Aber er verwahrt sich gegen die Unterstellung, als hätte er die Verse Vergil's in Musik umsetzen wollen.

Wenn man das Werk gehört hat, glaubt man dies dem Komponisten auf's Wort. Richard Strauß ist ein Waisenknabe gegen Loeffler, sofern die „Aufmachung" in Betracht kommt, und man kann ohne weiteres hinzufügen, daß der Schöpfer des „Heiden-Sanges" es mit den Modernsten der Modernen getrost aufnehmen kann in der Erzeugung von Geräuschen, die nach altväterischer Anschauung alles Andere, nur nicht Musik sind. Ein „Heiden-Lärm" ist dieser „Heiden-Sang", oftmals ein Tongewirre, in welchem man vergebens nach den Faden der Ariadne sucht. Der Klavierpart, den gestern Heinrich Gebhard übernommen hatte, soll, zeitweilig wenigstens, über das Chaos dominiren, aber gegen die Wucht des Orchesterkörpers konnte er unmöglich aufkommen. Mag sein, daß das Werk gewinnt, wenn man es öfters hört. Aber für's erste Mal wirkt es direkt brutal in seiner inneren Zerfahrenheit.

Die bekannte „Indianische Suite" von MacDowell war nach dem Vorausgegangenen ein wahres Labsal für's Ohr. Zumal sie vom Orchester, dem sie bekanntlich gewidmet ist, mit Hingebung und virtuos gespielt wurde.

Dr. Carl Muck dirigirte gestern mit mehr Elan, als gewöhnlich und bemühte sich erfolgreich, in die verworrensten Stellen des Loeffler'schen Werkes einige Klarheit zu bringen. Er erhielt zum Abschied — am nächsten Samstag Nachmittag werden wir ihm zum letzten Male an der Spitze der Bostoner sehen — einen Lorbeerkranz und eine recht herzliche Ovation.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

Address New York City.

AMERICAN PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Converse, Loeffler and MacDowell Represented by Compositions.

The first of the fifth pair of concerts given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place last night at Carnegie Hall, and was very largely attended.

As a compliment to the land in which he has lately been adding to his laurels, Dr. Muck had arranged a programme devoted entirely to American composers.

Much as the dstinguished German must be admired as a conductor, his judgment in the selection of programmes is not infallible. Last night, by including Mr. Loeffler's so-called "Pagan Poem" in his scheme he bored his audience and did little to advance the cause of our American musicians.

It is unjust to the memory of the great poet to pretend (as Mr. Loeffler does) that his composition was inspired by Virgil. There is no inspiration of any kind in the work, which, except for a few moments here and there, is insufferably pretentious, and, on a first hearing, appears meaningless.

The tone coloring, the harmonic combinations, in this "poem" at moments suggested that Mr. Loeffler had paid considerable attention to Debussy. But Debussy is eloquent. He is expressive. He really is what Mr. Loeffler hopes to be, a poet, who at moments can be pagan.

In this "poem" Mr. Loeffler is bewildering when he is not blatant.

There was omre poetry and more pagan sentiment in the beautiful "Pastoral Reverie" of Mr. Converse (forming part of the five scenes from his "Jeanne d'Arc" music) than in the whole of Mr. Loeffler's work. How Mr. Converse came to put paganism into a composition connected with the most Christian heroine is a mystery. But it is there. And it is in his "Battle Hymn." The "Jeanne d'Arc" music is not all as charming as that "Pastoral Reverie."

MacDowell's well-known "Indian" suite brought the concert to an enjoyable end.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

DR. KARL MUCK HONORED.

Showered with Gifts at Boston Orchestra's Final Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and final concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. It was by far the largest attended and most enthusiastically encored concert the orchestra has given in this city. At the close Dr. Karl Muck, the leader, was showered with flowers and gifts.

Dr. Muck, who has led the orchestra all through the season, will sail for Germany after the last matinee to-day. On account of an injury to his right arm he has been compelled to wield the baton in his left hand during the New York concerts.

[173]

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

MAY 20 1906

ALL-AMERICAN MUSIC DOESN'T DRAW A CROWD

Boston Orchestra Plays Compositions by Resident Writers.

MAYBE LOEFFLER GAVE SCARE

New Yorkers Not Used to New Man's New Music—Fine Playing in Carnegie Hall.

American music apparently does not exert a great attraction on friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night, at the season's final evening concert of our neighborly band, Dr. Muck offered a whole programme of music by so-called Americans, yet the audience in Carnegie Hall was not as large as usual. What can this mean? Are American music lovers in New York prejudiced against the creations of their own countrymen? Or can it be the audiences of the Boston Symphony are composed for the most part of men and women of foreign blood?

It is possible persons were scared away by the announcement of a new work by Loeffler, who shared the programme with Converse and MacDowell. This remarkable composer has found little favor with the cultured supporters of the Kneisel Quartet, so maybe the Symphony audiences uptown, just as gentle and proper and well-behaved and fashionably dressed, surely, as the lovers of salon classics in Mendelssohn Hall, also are mentally puckered by Loeffler's instrumental alum. Why, even the noble sonorites of Anton Bruckner, one of the really great in music, irritated the nerves of those good citizens whom Gericke, always perfectly proper, taught how to listen to music!

How absurd, though, to call Loeffler musically an American. As if a decade or so spent in this country, as if citizenship, or even language, signifies in art! Blood alone counts, and Charles Martin Loeffler was born in 1861 in Alsace. Loeffler is no more an American that Debussy.

There was no sensible or valid reason for putting the Alsatian's "Pagan Poem" on the same programme with Converse's dramatic scenes, "Jeanne d'Arc," and MacDowell's "Indian" suite. There was ample intrinsic reason, however, for producing the work here, and one may hope that there will be further opportunities to listen to its message. A single hearing gives only a scant idea of a composition made for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligato.

Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" originally was written for pianoforte, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola and double bass. Five years after its creation he remodeled and amplified it, treating it more symphonically. The tone-poem was inspired by verses from the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, particularly those lines which tell, in the fantastic imagery of the poet, of "the love incantations of a Thessalian, who by the aid of magical spells endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant wooer."

While Loeffler does not follow literally Virgil's verse, he gives an exceedingly imaginative, poetically conceived and finely wrought impressionist picture of such reflected feelings and moods as might be aroused in tones by the reading of it. Of melody in the conventional sense there is, of course, little if any. The thematic material is significant rather through its harmonic flavor and instrumental coloring than through beauty of melodic line. Naturally, there is not the dramatic strength and biting force of "The Death of Tintagiles," which still holds its own among Loeffler's works for originality and inspiration.

There is, on the other hand, a more refined interpretation of abstract and impalpable sensations and a greater fertility and refinement in instrumentation. The piano part, played excellently by Heinrich Gebhardt, is woven beautifully into the orchestral web. Frequently, however, it seems to replace merely the harp. The effect of the trumpets behind the scenes, proclaiming "the burden of the sorceress," "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home," was beautiful in effect.

There will be better opportunities, no doubt, to gauge the value of "A Pagan Poem." Its strong leaning upon Debussy, however; its unmistakable affinities to "Pelleas et Melisande"; its application even of the French composer's mannerisms, are not in its favor. It is considered by Loeffler enthusiasts his most successful work. Little doubt it is his most mature orchestral message. Yet to us it lacks the spontaneity, the directness, the convincing power of a truly vital utterance. A welcome work; an exceedingly interesting one. But not the inspiration of genius.

In Converse's music there is not much to arouse enthusiasm. The themes have little distinction or originality; the workmanship has little of compensatory value. The fourth movement, "Night Vision," is orchestrated effectively. The final movement, "The Maid of God," has a few good moments. On the whole, these scenes, originally composed as incidental music for Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc," give a weak description of the subject. Of the MacDowell music it is unnecessary to speak at this time. The orchestra played exceedingly well under the guidance of Muck, who conducted with his left hand for a large part of the evening.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Boston Symphony at Carnegie

FOR his final appearance in New York at an evening concert with the Boston Symphony, Dr. Muck was given a veritable ovation by an enthusiastic audience in Carnegie Hall last night. The great band from Boston has seldom played more brilliantly than it did last night under Dr. Muck's leadership.

The programme was devoted entirely to modern music. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," originally written for Mackaye's play of that name, has since been amplified into five dramatic scenes. Of these, the first and second, depicting the Maid of God in her early days at Domremy, were the most appealing.

Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," built on an episode from Virgil, and MacDowell's familiar Indian suite completed the programme.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the world

ss

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of Season Led by Karl Wendling, Concert Master.

When programs were opened by the large audience that packed the New National Theater yesterday afternoon to hear the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra little slips fluttered to the floor. They bore the legend "Dr. Muck is indisposed. Mr. Wendling will conduct." It was learned that Dr. Muck's indisposition arose from trouble with the nerves of his right arm. Mr. Wendling, who is concert master and first violin of the orchestra, is by no means unaccustomed to conducting the organization, and he filled Dr. Muck's place most acceptably. The audience was naturally disappointed, since the occasion would have been otherwise in the nature of a farewell to the retiring conductor, who is about to return to Germany, his two years' engagement terminating.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat, opus 60, as announced in Sunday's Star, was the foundation of the afternoon's music, although by some error the program had the sixth symphony listed, with a long analysis, which kept some of the audience watching for a tremendous thunderstorm, which never came, although every time the kettle drummer became more than usually busy the tiptoes of expectation were put to work. The symphony, with its quaint and sometimes plaintive melodies, was beautifully interpreted by Mr. Wendling. This composition, though obscured somewhat by the fame of its magnificent brethren, is charming, and has a grandeur also, though different in kind from that of the more majestic productions of Beethoven.

The fanciful Strauss composition, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," was the second number. This familiar work was selected, possibly, to show off the paces of the orchestra. If so, it was successful, for the music went with a verve and dash which would have pleased the madcap scamp himself. Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," an opera in Wagnerian form with a libretto by Catulle Mendes, who imitated the Wagnerian plots—or borrowed from a similar source—closed the program. One comment on the overture was that Chabrier shows all the faults of Wagner and not much of his dignity and splendor, but the composition is, at least, distinctive, though it be of a school. The closing passages elicited great applause.

During its season—the twenty-seventh in Washington—the orchestra has played, in addition to yesterday's program, two symphonies, Brahms No. 2 and Mendelssohn No. 3, with d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy and Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." Three concertos have been given—McDowell's No. 2 in D minor, Mendelssohn's in E minor and Rubinstein's No. 4 in D minor. The overtures have been those to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," Lalo's "The King of Ys" and Schumann's "Genoveva." Other composers represented were Bach and Rimsky-Korsakoff. The soloists were Paderewski, Kreisler and Mme. Carreno.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the world

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Final Concert This Season and Dr. Muck's Last Appearance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its twenty-third season in Philadelphia to a brilliant close last night. With no soloist on the program as an extraneous drawing card, the large audience which filled the Academy of Music was a tribute pure and simple to this admirably-balanced compact, skillful and unisonous body of instrumentalists and their conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Muck, because of a painful attack of neuritis in his right forearm, was suffering considerable pain and was forced to wield his baton for the most part with his left hand.

The program, while an exceedingly interesting one, was not as well "built" with regard to contrast as might have been wished. McDowell's "Indian Suite" and a "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, being highly characteristic music which had better been placed farther apart. These and the symphony, Beethoven's "Pastoral," were played in a fashion made possible only through that sufficiently long association by which this famous corps of musicians have acquired a well-nigh perfect unison of spirit, intuition, feeling and expression in orchestral artistry. The familiar "Pastoral" symphony (No. 6), with which the concert opened, was beautifully interpreted. In the "Indian Suite," which followed, the lamented Edward Alexander MacDowell's marvellous capabilities in depicting moods and expressing a poem in sound were most artistically illustrated by the orchestra, which played with vigor and vividness the variants of Indian melodies which appealed so powerfully to MacDowell's imaginiative temperament the love song, the story of war, the dirge and the village festival of the American aborigines, and at its conclusion Dr. Muck and his musicians were applauded until the entire body of arists arose and bowed in acknowledgement. The Spanish Caprice was a succession of characteristic dances and songs, with varying fervor, animation and daintiness and throughout producing fine colorful effects.

EVENING WORLD,
New York City.
MAR

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives American Programme

Works by Converse, Loeffler and MacDowell, Two Unfamiliar, Splendidly Played by Dr. Muck and His Men.

DR. KARL MUCK led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night largely with his left hand. He is suffering from neuritis. With the concert on Saturday afternoon the New York season of the Boston band comes to an end, and Dr. Muck is to say a final farewell to us. He will carry back with him to Berlin the respect and admiration of American music lovers. Last night's audience, which was a large and brilliant one, showed unmistakably by fervent applause and many recalls at the close of the concert the regret it felt.

As a parting compliment Dr. Muck had made his programme all American. It began with Frederick S. Converse's "Jeanne D'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, which the composer has built up from an overture and incidental music that he wrote for Percy Mackaye's drama on the subject. In its present form it is new here. It made no deep impression, although it had moments of charm. "The "Pastoral Reverie" and the "Battle Hymn," the second and third movements of the five, were the most effective. The latter has for its foundation the mediaeval hymn "Veni Creator."

Then followed Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," suggested by certain verses of Virgil, also unfamiliar. The composition has much of the modern elusive spirit, some stirring passages and not a little noise. Effective use is made of three trumpets behind the scenes. To keep them properly in touch with the orchestra a telephone with a big cone attachment was used last night. The piano is an important integral factor in the work. It was played last night effectively by Heinrich Gebhard.

MacDowell's familiar "Indian" suite was the final number. To all three compositions Dr. Muck and his splendid musicians did complete justice. They played at their best. Everybody knows how good is that best.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 19 1908

DR. MUCK NOT THERE

Last Boston Symphony Concert Of Season A Disappointment.

The failure of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to conduct last evening's concert of that organization at the Lyric, the concluding Baltimore performance of the orchestra for the winter, proved a keen disappointment to many of the large audience. Dr. Muck was prevented from taking part by a nervous affection of his right arm, which, according to Dr. Frederick R. Comee, one of the business managers of the orchestra, has been so painful as to make it almost impossible for the Doctor to lift his arm. The affection it is feared, may prevent Dr. Muck from conducting any more of the concerts of the orchestra this season.

To Baltimoreans the absence of Dr. Muck was felt all the more keenly since it was to have been his last appearance here prior to his departure for Europe and before the end of his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ceases at the conclusion of the present series.

Mr. Carl Wendling, the concertmeister, wielded the baton, and did it in an acceptable manner.

Following was last evening's program:

Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras.....Handel (Edition of Gustav F. Kogel), First time in Baltimore.

Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller (1770), Op. 100.....Reger
First time in Baltimore.

Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34,
Rimsky-Korsakoff
First time in Baltimore.

The Handel number, while one of that master's most obscure works, was doubtless the most interesting of the program. The work bears much of the stateliness of Handel which characterizes his better known and greater compositions and is an excellent example of one of the favorite methods of the old composer to divide the orchestra into separate and distinct families—a method subsequently adopted by many of the great and more modern writers.

Aside from this, however, it may be said that the performance proved almost a double disappointment—the absence of Dr. Muck being one and the presentation of a program considerably different from the usual standard being the other. Lately novelties seem to have become a habit with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—at least, so far as Baltimore is concerned. This does not suit many Baltimoreans who have attended the concerts for many years and have heretofore found in the dignified, classical performances genuine interest and delight.

The Reger variations and fugue was neither an interesting nor especialy delightful number. It is in itself of little substance and of less merit in its orchestration.

Spanish coloring was the main characteristic of the Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice. In the work the composer has resorted to a generous use of the devices for coloring, with the fanfare of the trumpets, the jingle of tambourines and triangle and the use of castanets ever in the foreground.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date MAR 22 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brooklyn at the Baptist Temple last Friday evening under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

[illegible] Bureau of the World

TIMES,
MAR 19 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIFTH CONCERT

Selections of Much Lighter Vein Than Heretofore Presented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and final concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

In the absence of Dr. Karl Muck, who is indisposed, the program was presented under the direction of the concert master, Carl Wendling.

Beethoven's Symphony in M major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68, in four movements, opened the performance. It was followed by Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28. Chabrier's overture, "Gwendoline," was the concluding number.

The selection of the program for this concert gave the audience compositions of a much lighter vein than heretofore presented by the Boston Symphony, and with the exception of the Chabrier overture, each has been heard here several times by different organizations.

The Strauss number was the best on the program, and was given a far better reading by the conductor than that of the Beethoven Symphony.

The entire concert, however, was not of the usual brilliancy followed by so excellent an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY
, MARCH 21, 1908

A new Norwegian composer, Johan Halvorsen, hitherto barely known here by his "March of the Boyars" at summer concerts, has a place on the programme of the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of the coming week. Halvorsen, a violinist and a conductor of distinction, has charge of the music at the principal theatre in Christiania. There he has written incidental music to various poetic plays, and in particular to a fantastic piece, "Fossegrimen." Later he arranged an orchestral suite from that music, and Dr. Muck and the band will play it next Friday for the first time in America. Some years ago Mr. Strube, one of the violinists of the orchestra and of the conductors at the summer concerts, wrote a "poem" for orchestra with viola obbligata, "Longing." More recently he has written another and very different piece for orchestra and viola, a "Fantastic Dance." The two will be played together next week, with Mr. Férir taking the viola part, and giving one of the rare opportunities to hear it as a distinctive instrument. The concert will end with Beethoven's first symphony, the eighth of the nine that Dr. Muck has played in his stay here. On the score of Beethoven, at least, the conservatives may not justly grumble.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
MAR 22 1908

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY AND DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL

Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Are Represented in Programme.

Yesterday afternoon for the last time during his present experience in America, Dr. Muck appeared with the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. There was a large audience.

The programme, which was strictly classical, included Haydn's well-known "Surprise" Symphony, the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and, as a parting gift, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which had been performed last Sunday by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra.

Since he first conducted here Dr. Muck has won the respect and admiration of New York. His departure will be widely and [illegible]

[174]

Max Fiedler to succeed Dr. Muck.

It is reported from Boston that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged Max Fiedler of Hamburg as conductor of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who, being unable to obtain further leave of absence from the Royal Opera in Berlin, will return to his duties there after the close of this season.

MAX FIEDLER.

August Max Fiedler has an excellent reputation as a conductor in Germany, and he is also known in that capacity in New York; for he was one of the "guest conductors" who came over to conduct for the Philharmonic Society in their period of interregnum. He conducted the third public rehearsal and concert of the Society in the season of 1905-6, on December 16 and 17, 1905. At that time, the "New York Times" spoke of him thus:

"Max Fiedler of Hamburg has a substantial reputation in Europe, but it has not been widely extended in this country. Mr. Fiedler, indeed, has none of the attributes of the 'virtuoso conductor' in the less desirable sense. But his performance with the orchestra yesterday showed him to be a highly accomplished director of remarkable skill, routine, overflowing vitality, and imperious authority. He is evidently something of a martinet, and the qualities of a martinet are what the Philharmonic Society needs at all times, in addition to all the others that go to make a conductor who can interpret great music in a way to hold the attention of such an audience as the Philharmonic's.

"Mr. Fiedler has much more; but he obtained, first of all, a performance of excellent ensemble, precision and brilliancy, such as few of the men who have preceded him with greater reputation have surpassed. He is not a poet, either in appearance or in manner, nor does he see visions of the unattainable things. He is not a revolutionary and is not bent on finding what none have found before him in the music he plays. Still less is he concerned with the exploitation of himself. Mr. Fiedler's demonstrations are all for the benefit of the orchestra and not at all for the audience. They are unmistakable and decisive and they have their results."

In Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, "all was sane, wholesome and well ordered." The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was "most broadly read and played with splendid vigor, and while Mr. Fiedler took the tempi with elasticity, he found occasion for nothing that disturbed well-known and well-beloved conceptions of the music."

Mr. Fiedler is now the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Hamburg. He has won honors outside of his own country, for besides his single pair of concerts in New York, he has conducted with success in Paris and Madrid, and for a number of years has conducted a series of concerts in St. Petersburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. He studied the piano with his father, who was a local music teacher. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil at the Leipzig Conservatory, where he distinguished himself as a pianist. He was engaged as instructor at the Hamburg Conservatory, of which he is now artistic director. His first essays as a conductor date from 1894. Fiedler has also made a name as a composer. He has produced a symphony, a piano quintet, a string quartet, and several songs and piano pieces. As conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic, he succeded Richard Barth.

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master in place of Mr. Carl Wendling and Mr. Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concert master in Stuttgart. He expects next summer to be at the Wagner Festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

For the immediate present the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been filled. Official announcement was made that the man to succeed Dr. Muck will be Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

But that disposes of the question of the Boston Symphony conductorship only for the present. Is Max Fiedler engaged for longer than one year? And if not, then is Dr. Muck to return to the orchestra after a year and is he then to become its permanent conductor? These are interesting questions which time and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will answer.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
Address
MAR

Dr. Karl Muck's Abschied.

Gestern Nachmittag gab das „Boston Symphony Orchester" in Carnegie Hall sein letztes Konzert in dieser Saison. Und sein Leiter Dr. Karl Muck nahm Abschied von den New Yorkern, die ihn sobald wohl nicht mehr sehen werden, da man ihm von Berlin aus keinen weiteren Urlaub gewähren will. Dr. Muck hat in den zwei Jahren seiner Thätigkit als Dirignt den hohen Standard der vornehmsten und leistungsfähigsten musikalischen Organisation Amerika's zu erhalten gewußt und uns durch die Eigenart seiner Interpretirung klassischer und anderer Musik viel Freude bereitet. Es hat manche sehr interessante Aufführungen gegeben, manchmal aber vermochte er nicht alle Zuhörer zu überzeugen, daß seine Auffassung die alleinig richtige sei. Zumal dann nicht, wenn er beim Bestreben, einzelne Schönheiten des Werkes plastisch herauszuarbeiten, feine Ciselirarbeit zu liefern, durch Verschleppen der Tempi die Wirkung des Ganzen beeinträchtigte. Großzügigkeit in der Auffassung schien uns nicht seine Hauptstärke zu sein, wohl aber war er ein Meister der Kleinkunst, wie selten einer da war. Man wird ihm ein freundliches Andenken bewahren. — Zum Abschiednehmen war zwar gestern nicht das rechte Wetter im Scheffel'schen Sinne, denn der Frühlingsanfang hatte uns auch einen Frühlingswetter beschert, aber mit dem heiteren Wetter standen die Darbietungen des Programmes dieses Abschieds-Konzertes im vollsten Einklange. Es gab die Symphonie in G-dur — die „mit dem Pautenschlag" — von Haydn, ferner die Ouverture zu Mozart's „Die Hochzeit des Figaro" und endlich Beethoven's vierte Symphonie, lauter Sachen, also, die Frische, Fröhlichkeit und Behagen ausströmen. Trotzdem, und obwohl sehr gut und besonders sehr korrekt gespielt wurde, blieb das Publikum merkwürdig kühl. Zum Schlusse allerdings setzte es einen dreimaligen Herausruf für den Scheidenden, aber man konnte sich des Eindruckes nicht erwehren, daß es sich mehr um die Erfüllung einer konventionellen Pflicht, als um eine aus dem Herzen kommende Huldigung handelte. Womit natürlich nichts Abfälliges über die Leistung des Orchesters und seines Leiters gesagt sein soll. Aber das Publikum scheint — was wir ihm wahrhaftig nicht verdenken können — konzertmüde zu sein. Denn der letzten Saison Qual war groß und man sehnt sich ernstlich nach Ruhe nach all' den Genüssen, die uns seit fünf Monaten in fast ununterbrochener Reihenfolge so verschwenderisch zuteil [illegible]

SUN,
New York City.
Address
MAR 22 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Hadyn's "Surprise" symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's fourth symphony. There was some doubt as to whether Dr. Karl Muck would be able to conduct, as he has been suffering from neuritis, and Concert-Master Wendling had to conduct in Brooklyn on Friday night. Mr. Wendling discharged his duties capably and [illegible] all would have gone well under his direction yesterday. But Dr. Muck was present and the concert went [illegible] programme. The [illegible]

EVENING WORLD,
New York City.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives American Programme

Works by Converse, Loeffler and MacDowell, Two Unfamiliar, Splendidly Played by Dr. Muck and His Men.

DR. KARL MUCK led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night largely with his left hand. He is suffering from neuritis. With the concert on Saturday afternoon the New York season of the Boston band comes to an end, and Dr. Muck is to say a final farewell to us. He will carry back with him to Berlin the respect and admiration of American music lovers. Last night's audience, which was a large and brilliant one, showed unmistakably by fervent applause and many recalls at the close of the concert the regret it felt.

As a parting compliment Dr. Muck had made his programme all American. It began with Frederick S. Converse's "Jeanne D'Arc," dramatic scenes for orchestra, which the composer has built up from an overture and incidental music that he wrote for Percy Mackaye's drama on the subject. In its present form it is new here. It made no deep impression, although it had moments of charm. The "Pastoral Reverie" and the "Battle Hymn," the second and third movements of the five, were the most effective. The latter has for its foundation the mediaeval hymn "Veni Creator."

Then followed Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," suggested by certain verses of Virgil, also unfamiliar. The composition has much of the modern elusive spirit, some stirring passages and not a little noise. Effective use is made of three trumpets behind the scenes. To keep them properly in touch with the orchestra a telephone with a big cone attachment was used last night. The piano is an important integral factor in the work. It was played last night effectively by Heinrich Gebhard.

MacDowell's familiar "Indian" suite was the final number. To all three compositions Dr. Muck and his splendid musicians did complete justice. They played at their best. Everybody knows how good is that best.

A Calling Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIFTH CONCERT

Selections of Much Lighter Vein Than Heretofore Presented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and final concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

In the absence of Dr. Karl Muck, who is indisposed, the program was presented under the direction of the concert master, Carl Wendling.

Beethoven's Symphony in M major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68, in four movements, opened the performance. It was followed by Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28. Chabrier's overture, "Gwendoline," was the concluding number.

The selection of the program for this concert gave the audience compositions of a much lighter vein than heretofore presented by the Boston Symphony, and with the exception of the Chabrier overture, each has been heard here several times by different organizations.

The Strauss number was the best on the program, and was given a far better reading by the conductor than that of the Beethoven Symphony.

The entire concert, however, was not of the usual brilliancy followed by so excellent an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DR. MUCK NOT THERE

Last Boston Symphony Concert Of Season A Disappointment.

The failure of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to conduct last evening's concert of that organization at the Lyric, the concluding Baltimore performance of the orchestra for the winter, proved a keen disappointment to many of the large audience. Dr. Muck was prevented from taking part by a nervous affection of his right arm, which, according to Mr. Frederick R. Comee, one of the business managers of the orchestra, has been so painful as to make it almost impossible for the Doctor to lift his arm. The affection it is feared, may prevent Dr. Muck from conducting any more of the concerts of the orchestra this season.

To Baltimoreans the absence of Dr. Muck was felt all the more keenly since it was to have been his last appearance here prior to his departure for Europe and before the end of his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ceases at the conclusion of the present series.

Mr. Carl Wendling, the concertmeister, wielded the baton, and did it in an acceptable manner.

Following was last evening's program:

Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras.....Handel (Edition of Gustav F. Kogel). First time in Baltimore.

Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller (1770), Op. 100.....Reger
First time in Baltimore.

Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
Rimsky-Korsakoff
First time in Baltimore.

The Handel number, while one of that master's most obscure works, was doubtless the most interesting of the program. The work bears much of the stateliness of Handel which characterizes his better known and greater compositions and is an excellent example of one of the favorite methods of the old composer to divide the orchestra into separate and distinct families—a method subsequently adopted by many of the great and more modern writers.

Aside from this, however, it may be said that the performance proved almost a double disappointment—the absence of Dr. Muck being one and the presentation of a program considerably different from the usual standard being the other. Lately novelties seem to have become a habit with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—at least, so far as Baltimore is concerned. This does not suit many Baltimoreans who have attended the concerts for many years and have heretofore found in the dignified, classical performances genuine interest and delight.

The Reger variations and fugue was neither an interesting nor especially delightful number. It is in itself of little substance and of less merit in its orchestration.

Spanish coloring was the main characteristic of the Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice. In the work the composer has resorted to a generous use of the devices for coloring, with the fanfare of the trumpets, the jingle of tamborines and triangle and the use of castanets ever in the foreground.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date MAR 22 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brooklyn at the Baptist Temple last Friday evening under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1908

A new Norwegian composer, Johan Halvorsen, hitherto barely known here by his "March of the Boyars" at summer concerts, has a place on the programme of the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of the coming week. Halvorsen, a violinist and a conductor of distinction, has charge of the music at the principal theatre in Christiania. There he has written incidental music to various poetic plays, and in particular to a fantastic piece, "Fossegrimen." Later he arranged an orchestral suite from that music, and Dr. Muck and the band will play it next Friday for the first time in America. Some years ago Mr. Strube, one of the violinists of the orchestra and of the conductors at the summer concerts, wrote a "poem" for orchestra with viola obbligata, "Longing." More recently he has written another and very different piece for orchestra and viola, a "Fantastic Dance." The two will be played together next week, with Mr. Férir taking the viola part, and giving one of the rare opportunities to hear it as a distinctive instrument. The concert will end with Beethoven's first symphony, the eighth of the nine that Dr. Muck has played in his stay here. On the score of Beethoven, at least, the conservatives may not justly grumble.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.

MAR 22 1908

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY AND DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL

Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Are Represented in Programme.

Yesterday afternoon for the last time during his present experience in America, Dr. Muck appeared with the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. There was a large audience.

The programme, which was strictly classical, included Haydn's well-known "Surprise" Symphony, the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and, as a parting gift, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which had been performed last Sunday by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra.

Since he first conducted here Dr. Muck has won the respect and admiration of New York. His departure will be widely and sincerely regretted.

Max Fiedler to succeed Dr. Muck.

It is reported from Boston that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged Max Fiedler of Hamburg as conductor of the orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who, being unable to obtain further leave of absence from the Royal Opera in Berlin, will return to his duties there after the close of this season.

MAX FIEDLER

August Max Fiedler has an excellent reputation as a conductor in Germany, and he is also known in that capacity in New York; for he was one of the "guest conductors" who came over to conduct for the Philharmonic Society in their period of interregnum. He conducted the third public rehearsal and concert of the Society in the season of 1905-6, on December 16 and 17, 1905. At that time, the "New York Times" spoke of him thus:

"Max Fiedler of Hamburg has a substantial reputation in Europe, but it has not been widely extended in this country. Mr. Fiedler, indeed, has none of the attributes of the 'virtuoso conductor' in the less desirable sense. But his performance with the orchestra yesterday showed him to be a highly accomplished director of remarkable skill, routine, overflowing vitality, and imperious authority. He is evidently something of a martinet, and the qualities of a martinet are what the Philharmonic Society needs at all times, in addition to all the others that go to make a conductor who can interpret great music in a way to hold the attention of such an audience as the Philharmonic's.

"Mr. Fiedler has much more; but he obtained, first of all, a performance of excellent ensemble, precision and brilliancy, such as few of the men who have preceded him with greater reputation have surpassed. He is not a poet, either in appearance or in manner, nor does he see visions of the unattainable things. He is not a revolutionary and is not bent on finding what none have found before him in the music he plays. Still less is he concerned with the exploitation of himself. Mr. Fiedler's demonstrations are all for the benefit of the orchestra and not at all for the audience. They are unmistakable and decisive and they have their results."

In Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, "all was sane, wholesome and well ordered." The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was "most broadly read and played with splendid vigor, and while Mr. Fiedler took the tempi with elasticity, he found occasion for nothing that disturbed well-known and well-beloved conceptions of the music."

Mr. Fiedler is now the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Hamburg. He has won honors outside of his own country, for besides his single pair of concerts in New York, he has conducted with success in Paris and Madrid, and for a number of years has conducted a series of concerts in St. Petersburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. He studied the piano with his father, who was a local music teacher. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil at the Leipzig Conservatory, where he distinguished himself as a pianist. He was engaged as instructor at the Hamburg Conservatory, of which he is now artistic director. His first essays as a conductor date from 1894. Fiedler has also made a name as a composer. He has produced a symphony, a piano quintet, a string quartet, and several songs and piano pieces. As conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic, he succeeded Richard Barth.

In addition to having a new conductor next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master and a new second concert master in place of Mr. Carl Wendling and Mr. Richard Czerwonky. Mr. Wendling has decided that he will not stay in America longer than the present season, and in this decision he has been moved solely by family reasons. He has a wife and some young children in Stuttgart, his home, and he does not feel that it would be wise to bring them to America, so at the end of the present season he will return to resume his position as concert master in Stuttgart. He expects next summer to be at the Wagner Festival in Bayreuth, but this will depend entirely upon his health. Recently he has had some trouble with the nerves of his left arm, and for this reason was unable to play with the orchestra for a week or two. If he recovers from this he will play in Bayreuth. Otherwise he will rest during the summer. Mr. Czerwonky leaves the orchestra in order to pursue the career of a virtuoso, for which he thinks himself better fitted than for orchestra work. The successors of these gentlemen have not yet been chosen, and probably will not be until later in the spring.

For the immediate present the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been filled. Official announcement was made that the man to succeed Dr. Muck will be Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

But that disposes of the question of the Boston Symphony conductorship only for the present. Is Max Fiedler engaged for longer than one year? And if not, then is Dr. Muck to return to the orchestra after a year and is he then to become its permanent conductor? These are interesting questions which time and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will answer.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Dr. Karl Muck's Abschied.

Gestern Nachmittag gab das „Boston Symphony Orchester" in Carnegie Hall sein letztes Konzert in dieser Saison. Und sein Leiter Dr. Karl Muck nahm Abschied von den New Yorkern, die ihn sobald wohl nicht mehr sehen werden, da man ihm von Berlin aus keinen weiteren Urlaub gewähren will. Dr. Muck hat in den zwei Jahren seiner Thätigkit als Dirignt den hohen Standard der vornehmsten und leistungsfähigsten musikalischen Organisation Amerika's zu erhalten gewußt und uns durch die Eigenart seiner Interpretirung klassischer und anderer Musik viel Freude bereitet. Es hat manche sehr interessante Aufführungen gegeben, manchmal aber vermochte er nicht alle Zuhörer zu überzeugen, daß seine Auffassung die alleinig richtige sei. Zumal dann nicht, wenn er beim Bestreben, einzelne Schönheiten des Werkes plastisch herauszuarbeiten, feine Ciselirarbeit zu liefern, durch Verschleppen der Tempi die Wirkung des Ganzen beeinträchtigte. Großzügigkeit in der Auffassung schien uns nicht seine Hauptstärke zu sein, wohl aber war er ein Meister der Kleinkunst, wie selten einer da war. Man wird ihm ein freundliches Andenken bewahren. — Zum Abschiednehmen war zwar gestern nicht das rechte Wetter im Scheffel'schen Sinne, denn der Frühlingsanfang hatte uns auch echtes Frühlingswetter beschert, aber mit dem heiteren Wetter standen die Darbietungen des Programmes dieses Abschieds-Konzertes im vollsten Einklange. Es gab die Symphonie in G-dur — die „mit dem Paukenschlag" — von Haydn, ferner die Ouverture zu Mozart's „Die Hochzeit des Figaro" und endlich Beethoven's vierte Symphonie, lauter Sachen, also, die Frische, Fröhlichkeit und Behagen ausströmen. Trotzdem, und obwohl sehr gut und besonders sehr korrekt gespielt wurde, blieb das Publikum merkwürdig kühl. Zum Schlusse allerdings setzte es einen dreimaligen Herausruf für den Scheidenden, aber man konnte sich des Eindruckes nicht erwehren, daß es sich mehr um die Erfüllung einer konventionellen Pflicht, als um eine aus dem Herzen kommende Huldigung handelte. Womit natürlich nichts Abfälliges über die Leistung des Orchesters und seines Leiters gesagt sein soll. Aber das Publikum scheint — was wir ihm wahrhaftig nicht verdenken können — konzertmüde zu sein. Denn der letzten Saison Qual war groß, und man sehnt sich ernstlich nach Ruhe nach all' den Genüssen, die uns seit fünf Monaten in fast ununterbrochener Reihenfolge so verschwenderisch zugedacht waren.

SUN,
New York City.

MAR 22 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Hadyn's "Surprise" symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's fourth symphony. There was some doubt as to whether Dr. Karl Muck would be able to conduct, as he has been suffering from neuritis, and Concert Master Wendling had to conduct in Brooklyn on Friday night. Mr. Wendling discharged his duties capably and doubtless all would have gone well under his direction yesterday. But Dr. Muck was able to direct and the concert went according to programme. The playing of the orchestra was up to its customary standard, and the large audience was enthusi-

[174]

SUN.
rom New York City.
ddress MAR 22 1908

[illegible] afternoon's concert of [illegible] Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall terminated so far as New York is concerned the activities of Karl Muck. He has endeared himself to the musical public of this city by qualities of the finest kind. Not only has he shown himself to be a musician of the most profound scholarship but also of the widest and most polished taste. His veneration for the classics is equalled by his enthusiasm for the writers of to-day. He has directed with superb skill compositions by the old masters and the progressists of the current time. He has demonstrated in every instance his right to the title of interpreter.

He has proved that an orchestra can be splendidly conducted without excitable gesticulation, but with repose and dignity. He has shown too that there were resources in the Boston Symphony Orchestra not previously disclosed. The tonal beauty of the playing of the organization has not diminished under his guidance, but it has gained in brilliancy and sonority. The orchestra was never before at such a high pitch of excellence as that at which he leaves it.

It is a loss to music in this country to have him go away. But the German Emperor, it seems, is unwilling to do without him any longer. For this we surely cannot blame his imperial Majesty. If this writer were an Emperor and had a conductor, like Dr. Muck he would keep him at home no matter how anxious Boston might be to borrow him for a year or two.

Dr. Muck's successor, Max Fiedler, will undoubtedly have an uncomfortable beginning, for although he made a distinctly favorable impression when he conducted the Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905, the public can hardly be expected to recall it now. THE SUN at the time noted with satisfaction that Mr. Fiedler was not disposed to display himself as the author of new and important readings but that at the same time his conducting was lacking in neither spirit nor individuality. It was infused with a strong and communicative temperament. He delivered himself of the "Meistersinger" prelude with much glory, making the whole composition luminous and vital. He directed the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss with authority and with enthusiasm. He led the players also in a performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony, and this is what THE SUN said about it:

"He showed complete respect for the purpose of the composer. His tempo in the first movement was a mere trifle quicker than that used by many other conductors, yet it had much to commend it, especially in the potent message of the working out.

"The slow movement Mr. Fiedler read exquisitely and his nice sense of tonal balance, manifested throughout the afternoon, made the generally buried bass variation come out beautifully. The trio of the scherzo was given with uncommon vigor and the finale was read most brilliantly. Altogether it was a fine interpretation of the great symphony, and the audience was quick to discern its value.

"From the point of view of the orchestra Mr. Fiedler is a most satisfactory conductor. He is very demonstrative and his beat is pantomimic in its variety of gesture. Perhaps some of this conveys more to the public eye than is necessary for the correct guidance of the musicians, but on the other hand the care with which every entrance and nuance was indicated must have given the players a comforting sense of security, and certainly prevented any possibility of their forgetting anything imparted to them at the rehearsals."

It is hardly likely that Mr. Fiedler will be as captivating to the public eye as Dr. Muck, for after all the appearance of a conductor has something to do with his popularity. But it is pretty safe to indulge in the hope that the sound musicianship and enthusiasm of the new conductor will win for him the esteem of the local public, which dearly loves the orchestra from Boston.

W. J. HENDERSON.

EVENING WORLD,
New York City.
ss

DR. KARL MUCK BIDS FAREWELL TO NEW YORK.

Dr. Karl Muck took his leave of New York at the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The large audience showed unmistakably its regret. He came into direction of this orchestra two years ago in succession to Mr. Gericke, who had refined it to the highest degree. He leaves it to return to Berlin at the command of the German Emperor without any impairment of its universally acknowledged excellence and with some added strength. The programme was classical. It consisted of Haydn's symphony in G major, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's fourth symphony, all admirably [illegible] played.

om Daily Eagle,
dress [illegible], N. Y.
te MAR 21 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr. Muck Ill and Mr. Wendling Led the Orchestra for "Dr. Muck's Farewell" to Brooklyn.

Brooklyn did not have a chance to extend its farewell greetings to Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple last evening. A great audience had assembled, quite prepared to let Dr. Muck know that Brooklyn liked him better than any conductor the orchestra has had since Arthur Nikisch, and that it was exceedingly sorry that the German Emperor would not loan him to us longer. But just when the leader was expected a man, who gave an unfortunately English twist to Dr. Muck's name, announced that the leader was confined to his hotel with an attack of ptomaine poisoning and that Carl Wendling, the concert master, would lead the programme.

Disappointment at the absence of the conductor whom Brooklyn has learned to admire did not prevent the audience from giving Mr. Wendling a hearty welcome when he came forward, and the programme went on as if the leader had been present. Of course, the real work of conducting an orchestra is done at rehearsals, and the Boston Orchestra is so thoroughly rehearsed that the men could play in public without any baton at all. Mr. Wendling brought much nervous energy and the sharp rhythmic emphasis which Dr. Muck insists upon to his task, and the programme flowed peacefully and gracefully on with the delicacy of shading and the perfection of tone which has made this band famous.

In fact Dr. Muck had set himself, for his farewell to Brooklyn, a task like to that of putting the fabled hatched chick back into the egg. He had selected a programme of Handel, Haydn and Mozart, and proposed to carry a twentieth century audience, which has learned to love the glorious sonorities of Wagner, which has opened its heart to the black tragedy of Tschaikowsky, has puzzled over the metaphysics of Strauss and has listened with sympathetic curiosity, at least, to the Frenchmen whose specialty is getting off the whole bunch of keys, back to a time when music meant peace and joy and lightheartedness, and above everything else profound respect for all the constituted authorities and all the social and artistic precedents.

Of course, neither Dr. Muck nor anybody else can make us of to-day eighteenth century in our spirit. We can't think Handel "noisy," as some of his contemporaries did; and that we cannot get up more than an amused and consciously prepared shock over "Papa Haydn's" iconoclastic use of the bass drum in his "surprise" symphony. The most we can do is to conjure ourselves into an appreciative sympathy to watch the old-fashioned procession pass by, to enjoy the pretty tunes and to marvel at the strictly formal manner in which they were decked forth.

For that purpose the programme last night was excellently chosen. The Handel concerto for strings and two wind orchestras had some curious combinations of oboes and horns with the strings. But above everything else, for modern ears, it had the Handelian spirit, the runs and roulades, written this time for the wind choir, which we find in his oratories for voices, and played last night by the members of the orchestra with great elegance and smoothness. The "surprise" symphony of Haydn surprised rather by the perennial freshness of its melodies than by the tang of its drum beats. It is the joyous music of a childhood which, like Peter Pan, refused to grow up. In contrast to our bigger, sadder world and its sadder music, this simple music, with its clearly cut, happy rhythms, is a perpetual delight.

After Handel and Haydn the Mozart Symphony in D major sounded almost modern. Mozart was a child of the sun, too, but the modern ear detects, or fancies, something deeper than gayety under his perfect finish and his springing melodies. Just as his "Don Giovanni" holds its place in our modern opera houses where Wagner and Debussy are sung, so would this Symphony in D, with its heavenly andante, make itself a welcome in a programme with Beethoven or Schumann or Brahms. Last night it actually sounded as if we had got almost home from a long journey strange voices for to hear.

For once the experiment of an eighteenth century programme was interesting, but let us hope that Dr. Muck's successor does not repeat it too often. The old forms are better as decorations and reliefs to a modern feast, for modern ears. But if the Boston Symphony audience, the most representative company regularly assembled in Brooklyn, could not say farewell to Dr. Muck it did say good-by to the Baptist Temple as its place of assemblage. The first concert next November will be held in the new Academy of Music. With all due appreciation of the public spirit of the officers and congregation of the Temple in throwing their auditorium open when otherwise Brooklyn must have gone without large concerts, the concert audiences will not be sorry to meet in the Academy. Everything has been done at the Temple that could be done to make the concert audiences welcome and the concerts there agreeable, but all the good will in the world does not alter the fact that the Temple was built for preaching while the Academy has been built for music. Both services will probably be more pleasantly conducted now that their enforced association has come to an end. But nevertheless gratitude and appreciation are due to the officers of the Temple for permitting the larger forms of music to be continued in Brooklyn during the inconvenient hiatus between the old Academy and the new.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 21 1908

MUSICAL.

Boston Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season and Last in Baptist Temple.

Conditions affecting the giving of concerts in Brooklyn contributed to make a concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra an occasion of conspicuous sentimental interest. It was the last concert of the present season by this orchestra in Brooklyn, it was their last appearance at the Baptist Temple, for the new Academy will be ready for service next fall, and it was to be the farewell to Brooklyn of Dr. Carl Muck, who returns to Germany after two years' work with the orchestra. In this latter respect the concert was a disappointment, for Dr. Muck is ill with ptomaine poisoning in a Manhattan hotel, and was unable to lead last night. Possibly the concert did not suffer to any appreciable extent from his absence, as the music was not of a character to seriously test the powers of the players, and Concert Master Wendling put them through their allotted task with an apparent knowledge of the precise requirements.

Besides this disappointment the programme was scarcely as interesting as it might have been. The music was all of a time-honored character, genial and pleasant, but was not calculated to lend any sentimental eclat to the concert as a brilliantly eloquent finale which, in the minds of many, may have appeared appropriate and particularly timely. But programme-making conductors such as conform to the policy of the Boston Orchestra are not given to taking much account of sentimental considerations, and it would be far from the purpose of a conductor of Dr. Muck's culture and good taste to frame a programme with the object of making a grand-stand finish to his work in Brooklyn. Still the programme could have offered more contrast without giving the impression suggested.

A representative audience filled the Temple and while the concert cannot be said to have fully gratified the local feeling of interest in the occasion it is worth mentioning that, barring one or two picturesque exits which are so carefully timed toward the close of each of these concerts as to claim some attention, the big gathering of listeners was courteously attentive to the end. Three composers of the old school contributed the music, and there was no soloist. This latter circumstance is mentioned only as a matter of record, and not of regret, for Brooklyn has come well out into that larger, intelligent appreciation which can enjoy an exclusively orchestral concert as a distinct musical entity of individual musical worth. Handel was represented by his Concerto in F major for strings and wood-wind instruments, arranged in five movements by Gustav F. Kogel; Haydn was on the list for his Symphony in G, called "The Surprise," and from Mozart there was the Symphony in D major (Kochel, No. 504).

The Handel work is a modern arrangement and was given for the first time here. It can hardly be said, however, that it offers any significant disclosure of Handel's powers not already familiar. Composed, so far as can be learned, just before the "Messiah," it contains thematic material which the composer has evidently made more notable use of in his famous oratorio. In phraseology and cadence it abounds with hints of the composer's better-known vocal works. Definitely apparent in this respect is the fragment of melody set to the words of the chorus "For Unto Us a Child Is Born," and there is quite a pronounced foreshadowing of the well-known Pastoral Symphony. The Haydn and Mozart symphonies are standard types in this form, as it was known at the end of the eighteenth century. Both are delightfully characteristic specimens of their respective composers, the one showing the dainty, lucid, charming frankness of "Papa" Haydn, and the other expressing the grace and formal elegance for which Mozart is noted.

For four years, since the old Academy was destroyed by fire in November, 1903, these concerts have been given in the Baptist Temple, which has served the purpose as well as could be expected, under the circumstances, but, which has never proved an altogether satisfactory substitute for a suitable concert hall. This has been quite well understood and considering this it is the more creditable to local interest in music that the concerts have been well supported during these four years.

om STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
dress
te MAR 21 1908

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Heute Nachmittag findet in Carnegie Hall das letzte diesjährige Symphonie-Konzert der Bostoner unter Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck statt, welcher damit von New York künstlerisch Abschied nimmt.

EVENING POST,
ss New York City.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Dr. Muck's American Programme.

There is a story of a musician who, in talking with another passenger on a transatlantic steamer, boasted that he was the best horn player in the world. "How do you prove it?" asked the other man, and the player responded: "I don't prove it; I admit it."

One could not but think of this episode on reading the programme book printed for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On one of its pages Mr. Philip Hale quotes what Mr. Converse wrote about his "dramatic scenes for orchestra" entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which was the first piece played. Originally, this music was composed to accompany Percy Mackaye's drama "Jeanne d'Arc," with Julia Marlowe and E. H. Sothern in the leading parts. This is what Mr. Converse wrote about it on the occasion of this production:

While the music follows somewhat the lines of incidental music written by Mendelssohn for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Bizet for "L'Arlésienne," and by Grieg for "Peer Gynt," it is more modern in treatment and style.

It approaches the problem of dramatic expression from a broader and more highly organized standpoint, and uses to a certain extent the "leading motive" plan which obtains in modern opera. Although there are several independent ballads, choruses, and chants, drawn mostly from mediæval French folk-song and Gregorian ritual chants suitable to the nature of the play, the music is, as a whole, built upon original themes, which represent different characters, situations, and emotional phases of the drama. Among them may be mentioned the Jeanne motive, the vesper motive, the pastoral, vision, and battle motives, all of which occur in varied and characteristic guises, suitable to the situations which they underlie and typify.

These musical thoughts are worked and woven, in overture and entr'actes, into orchestral pieces which bridge over the pauses between the acts in such a way as to hold the mood of the listener and prepare the mind for what is to follow upon the stage.

In this way a complete musical drama accompanies in emotional progress the development of the play itself. The whole is organically built up, and has a unity of purpose and expression which is entirely lacking in the fragmentary, unrelated, and often meaningless and irrelevant music which is usually played in our theatres.

The last statement is doubtless true; but, as for the first statement: that this music is "more modern in treatment and style" than the work of Mendelssohn, Bizet, and Grieg referred to, we must say that Mr. Converse does not prove it; he admits it. The three works referred to are among the immortal masterpieces of genius; they were modern in treatment and style when written, they are modern today and will be modern a century hence. For their purposes they could not be improved on; and the only point in which they may seem less "modern"—in the present sense, alas! of modernity—is in their wealth of invention. In inventive power Mr. Converse is weak, like most composers of our time; the lack of individuality in the themes made each of his numbers seem too long. Yet there is evidence of sound musicianship on every page; the orchestration is excellent, and the harmonization never degenerates into discordization (we need the word). There is more substance to this music than to those awful variations of Max Reger which the same orchestra played here a few weeks ago. The best thing about Mr. Converse's score is his skill in creating atmosphere. This is particularly noticeable in the fourth scene, entitled "Night Vision"—the wearied Jeanne sleeping in the woods. Here the silvery shimmer of the moon is admirably translated into tones.

Atmosphere, also, is the best thing about the second piece on last night's programme, Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," an orchestral fantasy, inspired by the reading of certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil telling of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who, by the aid of magical spells, endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover, Daphnis. Trumpets placed behind the scenes play the incantation: "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home." In the mixing of colors, Mr. Loeffler is a master. In all other respects his music is tiresome, being entirely devoid of genuine melody, while his harmonies, when they attract attention, nearly always suggest his model Debussy, whom he imitates with truly Handelian boldness.

After these two pieces the last number, MacDowell's Indian Suite, seemed doubly inspired. Dr. Muck and his men gave it a performance that brought out its moments of exultation, as well as its exquisite tenderness and lovely orchestral coloring.

[175]

SUN,
rom New York City.
ddress
27, 1908

With yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall terminated so far as New York is concerned the activities of Karl Muck. He has endeared himself to the musical public of this city by qualities of the finest kind. Not only has he shown himself to be a musician of the most profound scholarship but also of the widest and most polished taste. His veneration for the classics is equalled by his enthusiasm for the writers of to-day. He has directed with superb skill compositions by the old masters and the progressists of the current time. He has demonstrated in every instance his right to the title of interpreter.

He has proved that an orchestra can be splendidly conducted without excitable gesticulation, but with repose and dignity. He has shown too that there were resources in the Boston Symphony Orchestra not previously disclosed. The tonal beauty of the playing of the organization has not diminished under his guidance, but it has gained in brilliancy and sonority. The orchestra was never before at such a high pitch of excellence as that at which he leaves it.

It is a loss to music in this country to have him go away. But the German Emperor, it seems, is unwilling to do without him any longer. For this we surely cannot blame his imperial Majesty. If this writer were an Emperor and had a conductor, like Dr. Muck he would keep him at home no matter how anxious Boston might be to borrow him for a year or two.

Dr. Muck's successor, Max Fiedler, will undoubtedly have an uncomfortable beginning, for although he made a distinctly favorable impression when he conducted the Philharmonic Society on December 15 and 16, 1905, the public can hardly be expected to recall it now. THE SUN at the time noted with satisfaction that Mr. Fiedler was not disposed to display himself as the author of new and important readings but that at the same time his conducting was lacking in neither spirit nor individuality. It was infused with a strong and communicative temperament. He delivered himself of the "Meistersinger" prelude with much glory, making the whole composition luminous and vital. He directed the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss with authority and with enthusiasm. He led the players also in a performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony, and this is what THE SUN said about it:

"He showed complete respect for the purpose of the composer. His tempo in the first movement was a mere trifle quicker than that used by many other conductors, yet it had much to commend it, especially in the potent message of the working out.

"The slow movement Mr. Fiedler read exquisitely and his nice sense of tonal balance, manifested throughout the afternoon, made the generally buried bass variation come out beautifully. The trio of the scherzo was given with uncommon vigor and the finale was read most brilliantly. Altogether it was a fine interpretation of the great symphony, and the audience was quick to discern its value.

"From the point of view of the orchestra Mr. Fiedler is a most satisfactory conductor. He is very demonstrative and his beat is pantomimic in its variety of gesture. Perhaps some of this conveys more to the public eye than is necessary for the correct guidance of the musicians, but on the other hand the care with which every entrance and nuance was indicated must have given the players a comforting sense of security, and certainly prevented any possibility of their forgetting anything imparted to them at the rehearsals."

It is hardly likely that Mr. Fiedler will be as captivating to the public eye as Dr. Muck, for after all the appearance of a conductor has something to do with his popularity. But it is pretty safe to indulge in the hope that the sound musicianship and enthusiasm of the new conductor will win for him the esteem of the local public, which dearly loves the orchestra from Boston.

W. J. HENDERSON.

EVENING WORLD,
ss New York City.

DR. KARL MUCK BIDS FAREWELL TO NEW YORK.

Dr. Karl Muck took his leave of New York at the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The large audience showed unmistakably its regret. He came into direction of this orchestra two years ago in succession to Mr. Gericke, who had restored it to the highest degree. He leaves it to return to Berlin at the command of the German Emperor without any impairment of its universally acknowledged excellence and with some added strength. The programme was classical. It consisted of Haydn's symphony in G major, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's fourth symphony, all admirably read and played.

---

om Daily Eagle,
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te MAR 21 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr. Muck Ill and Mr. Wendling Led the Orchestra for "Dr. Muck's Farewell" to Brooklyn.

Brooklyn did not have a chance to extend its farewell greetings to Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple last evening. A great audience had assembled, quite prepared to let Dr. Muck know that Brooklyn liked him better than any conductor the orchestra has had since Arthur Nickisch and that it was exceedingly sorry that the German Emperor would not loan him to us longer. But just when the leader was expected a man, who gave an unfortunately English twist to Dr. Muck's name, announced that the leader was confined to his hotel with an attack of ptomaine poisoning and that Carl Wendling, the concert master, would lead the programme.

Disappointment at the absence of the conductor whom Brooklyn has learned to admire did not prevent the audience from giving Mr. Wendling a hearty welcome when he came forward, and the programme went on as if the leader had been present. Of course, the real work of conducting an orchestra is done at rehearsals, and the Boston Orchestra is so thoroughly rehearsed that the men could play in public without any baton at all. Mr. Wendling brought much nervous energy and the sharp rhythmic emphasis which Dr. Muck insists upon to his task, and the programme flowed peacefully and gracefully on with the delicacy of shading and the perfection of tone which has made this band famous.

In fact Dr. Muck had set himself, for his farewell to Brooklyn, a task like to that of putting the fabled hatched chick back into the egg. He had selected a programme of Handel, Haydn and Mozart, and proposed to carry a twentieth century audience, which has learned to love the glorious sonorities of Wagner, which has opened its heart to the black tragedy of Tschaikowsky, has puzzled over the metaphysics of Strauss and has listened with sympathetic curiosity, at least, to the Frenchmen whose specialty is getting off the whole bunch of keys, back to a time when music meant peace and joy and lightheartedness, and above everything else profound respect for all the constituted authorities and all the social and artistic precedents.

Of course, neither Dr. Muck nor anybody else can make us of to-day eighteenth century in our spirit. We can't think Handel "noisy," as some of his contemporaries did; and that we cannot get up more than an amused and consciously prepared shock over "Papa Haydn's" iconoclastic use of the bass drum in his "surprise" symphony. The most we can do is to conjure ourselves into an appreciative sympathy to watch the old-fashioned procession pass by, to enjoy the pretty tunes and to marvel at the strictly formal manner in which they were decked forth.

For that purpose the programme last night was excellently chosen. The Handel concerto for strings and two wind orchestras had some curious combinations of oboes and horns with the strings. But above everything else, for modern ears, it had the Handelian spirit, the runs and roulades, written this time for the wind choir, which we find in his oratories for voices, and played last night by the members of the orchestra with great elegance and smoothness. The "surprise" symphony of Haydn surprised rather by the perennial freshness of its melodies than by the tang of its drum beats. It is the joyous music of a childhood which, like Peter Pan, refused to grow up. In contrast to our bigger, sadder world and its sadder music, this simple music, with its clearly cut, happy rhythms, is a perpetual delight.

After Handel and Haydn the Mozart Symphony in D major sounded almost modern. Mozart was a child of the sun, too, but the modern ear detects, or fancies, something deeper than gayety under his perfect finish and his springing melodies. Just as his "Don Giovanni" holds its place in our modern opera houses where Wagner and Debussy are sung, so would this Symphony in D, with its heavenly andante, make itself a welcome in a programme with Beethoven or Schumann or Brahms. Last night it actually sounded as if we had got almost home from a long journey strange voices for to hear.

For once the experiment of an eighteenth century programme was interesting, but let us hope that Dr. Muck's successor does not repeat it too often. The old forms are better as decorations and reliefs to a modern feast, for modern ears. But if the Boston Symphony audience, the most representative company regularly assembled in Brooklyn, could not say farewell to Dr. Muck it did say good-by to the Baptist Temple as its place of assemblage. The first concert next November will be held in the new Academy of Music. With all due appreciation of the public spirit of the officers and congregation of the Temple in throwing their auditorium open when otherwise Brooklyn must have gone without large concerts, the concert audiences will not be sorry to meet in the Academy. Everything has been done at the Temple that could be done to make the concert audiences welcome and the concerts therein agreeable, but all the good will in the world does not alter the fact that the Temple was built for preaching while the Academy has been built for music. Both services will probably be more pleasantly conducted now that their enforced association has come to an end. But nevertheless gratitude and appreciation are due to the officers of the Temple for permitting the larger forms of music to be continued in Brooklyn during the inconvenient hiatus between the old Academy and the new.

---

s Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 21 1908

MUSICAL.

Boston Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season and Last in Baptist Temple.

Conditions affecting the giving of concerts in Brooklyn contributed to make a concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra an occasion of conspicuous sentimental interest. It was the last concert of the present season by this orchestra in Brooklyn, it was their last appearance at the Baptist Temple, for the new Academy will be ready for service next fall, and it was to be the farewell to Brooklyn of Dr. Carl Muck, who returns to Germany after two years' work with the orchestra. In this latter respect the concert was a disappointment, for Dr. Muck is ill with ptomaine poisoning in a Manhattan hotel, and was unable to lead last night. Possibly the concert did not suffer to any appreciable extent from his absence, as the music was not of a character to seriously test the powers of the players, and Concert Master Wendling put them through their allotted task with an apparent knowledge of the precise requirements.

Besides this disappointment the programme was scarcely as interesting as it might have been. The music was all of a time-honored character, genial and pleasant, but was not calculated to lend any sentimental eclat to the concert as a brilliantly eloquent finale which, in the minds of many, may have appeared appropriate and particularly timely. But programme-making conductors such as conform to the policy of the Boston Orchestra are not given to taking much account of sentimental considerations, and it would be far from the purpose of a conductor of Dr. Muck's culture and good taste to frame a programme with the object of making a grand-stand finish to his work in Brooklyn. Still the programme could have offered more contrast without giving the impression suggested.

A representative audience filled the Temple and while the concert cannot be said to have fully gratified the local feeling of interest in the occasion it is worth mentioning that, barring one or two picturesque exits which are so carefully timed toward the close of each of these concerts as to claim some attention, the big gathering of listeners was courteously attentive to the end. Three composers of the old school contributed the music, and there was no soloist. This latter circumstance is mentioned only as a matter of record, and not of regret, for Brooklyn has come well out into that larger, intelligent appreciation which can enjoy an exclusively orchestral concert as a distinct musical entity of individual musical worth. Handel was represented by his Concerto in F major for strings and wood-wind instruments, arranged in five movements by Gustav F. Kogel; Haydn was on the list for his Symphony in G, called "The Surprise," and from Mozart there was the Symphony in D major (Kochel, No. 504).

The Handel work is a modern arrangement and was given for the first time here. It can hardly be said, however, that it offers any significant disclosure of Handel's powers not already familiar. Composed, so far as can be learned, just before the "Messiah," it contains thematic material which the composer has evidently made more notable use of in his famous oratorio. In phraseology and cadence it abounds with hints of the composer's better-known vocal works. Definitely apparent in this respect is the fragment of melody set to the words of the chorus "For Unto Us a Child Is Born," and there is quite a pronounced foreshadowing of the well-known Pastoral Symphony. The Haydn and Mozart symphonies are standard types in this form, as it was known at the end of the eighteenth century. Both are delightfully characteristic specimens of their respective composers, the one showing the dainty, lucid, charming frankness of "Papa" Haydn, and the other expressing the grace and formal elegance for which Mozart is noted.

For four years, since the old Academy was destroyed by fire in November, 1893, these concerts have been given in the Baptist Temple, which has served the purpose as well as could be expected, under the circumstances, but, which has never proved an altogether satisfactory substitute for a suitable concert hall. This has been quite well understood and considering this it is the more creditable to local interest in music that the concerts have been well supported during these four years.

---

om STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
dress
te MAR 21 1908

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Heute Nachmittag findet in Carnegie Hall das letzte diesjährige Symphonie-Konzert der Bostoner unter Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck statt, welcher damit von New York künstlerisch Abschied nimmt.

EVENING POST,
ss New York City.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Dr. Muck's American Programme.

There is a story of a musician who, in talking with another passenger on a transatlantic steamer, boasted that he was the best horn player in the world. "How do you prove it?" asked the other man, and the player responded: "I don't prove it; I admit it."

One could not but think of this episode on reading the programme book printed for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On one of its pages Mr. Philip Hale quotes what Mr. Converse wrote about his "dramatic scenes for orchestra" entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which was the first piece played. Originally, this music was composed to accompany Percy Mackaye's drama "Jeanne d'Arc," with Julia Marlowe and E. H. Sothern in the leading parts. This is what Mr. Converse wrote about it on the occasion of this production:

While the music follows somewhat the lines of incidental music written by Mendelssohn for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Bizet for "L'Arlésienne," and by Grieg for "Peer Gynt," it is more modern in treatment and style.

It approaches the problem of dramatic expression from a broader and more highly organized standpoint, and uses to a certain extent the "leading motive" plan which obtains in modern opera. Although there are several independent ballads, choruses, and chants, drawn mostly from mediæval French folk-song and Gregorian ritual chants suitable to the nature of the play, the music is, as a whole, built upon original themes, which represent different characters, situations, and emotional phases of the drama. Among them may be mentioned the Jeanne motive, the vesper motive, the pastoral, vision, and battle motives, all of which occur in varied and characteristic guises, suitable to the situations which they underlie and typify.

These musical thoughts are worked and woven, in overture and entr'actes, into orchestral pieces which bridge over the pauses between the acts in such a way as to hold the mood of the listener and prepare the mind for what is to follow upon the stage.

In this way a complete musical drama accompanies in emotional progress the development of the play itself. The whole is organically built up, and has a unity of purpose and expression which is entirely lacking in the fragmentary, unrelated, and often meaningless and irrelevant music which is usually played in our theatres.

The last statement is doubtless true; but, as for the first statement: that this music is "more modern in treatment and style" than the work of Mendelssohn, Bizet, and Grieg referred to, we must say that Mr. Converse does not prove it; he admits it. The three works referred to are among the immortal masterpieces of genius; they were modern in treatment and style when written, they are modern today and will be modern a century hence. For their purposes they could not be improved on; and the only point in which they may seem less "modern"—in the present sense, alas! of modernity—is in their wealth of invention. In inventive power Mr. Converse is weak, like most composers of our time; the lack of individuality in the themes made each of his numbers seem too long. Yet there is evidence of sound musicianship on every page; the orchestration is excellent, and the harmonization never degenerates into discordization (we need the word). There is more substance to this music than to those awful variations of Max Reger which the same orchestra played here a few weeks ago. The best thing about Mr. Converse's score is his skill in creating atmosphere. This is particularly noticeable in the fourth scene, entitled "Night Vision"—the wearied Jeanne sleeping in the woods. Here the silvery shimmer of the moon is admirably translated into tones.

Atmosphere, also, is the best thing about the second piece on last night's programme, Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," an orchestral fantasy, inspired by the reading of certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil telling of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who, by the aid of magical spells, endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover, Daphnis. Trumpets placed behind the scenes play the incantation: "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home." In the mixing of colors, Mr. Loeffler is a master. In all other respects his music is tiresome, being entirely devoid of genuine melody, while his harmonies, when they attract attention, nearly always suggest his model Debussy, whom he imitates with truly Handelian boldness.

After these two pieces the last number, MacDowell's Indian Suite, seemed doubly inspired. Dr. Muck and his men gave it a performance that brought out its moments of exultation, as well as its exquisite tenderness and lovely orchestral coloring.

From EVENING SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON LEADER SAYS GOODBY AS PLAIN AMERICAN.

Philadelphia Goes Madly Riotting Down Locust and Broad Streets' Classic Shades After Tetrazzini and Hammerstein—Twenty Weeks of Metropolitan Opera Again Next Season, the Old Subscribers Are Told—Emma Eames Out of "Trovatore"—Rubelik Heard in Brooklyn—First "Fidelio" and Farewell "Pelleas" To-night.

Dr. Karl Muck's best audience in this town tried hard last night to kill him with kindness. But musicians as a race always did die hard. Even with his nerve-racked right arm, that had laid him up at Washington this week, the man was bound and determined to see all the fun there was coming to him at his round-up of New York farewells. He survived the heavy green wreath that was hurled upon Carnegie Hall's stage after the first musical number last evening. He would have sidestepped so weighty a prize. But the mighty dean of ushers, Tom Holahan, waved the offering at his feet until this frail and delicate musician stooped down, executed a dexterous "left hook" that we commend to the emulation of strenuous greatness at Berlin or elsewhere, and carried off the honors of the night with a crook of his uninjured elbow and a smile.

An all-American programme was Muck's parting bit of pleasantry that will be kindly remembered here. The "Jeanne d'Arc" of Converse was put forward modestly as curtain-raiser. Barring its ancient battle hymn of "Veni, Creator Spiritus," it was little better than theatre music in concert. It could only have been worse as absolute music in the theatre play it was written for. That, at least, we were spared. But those who wanted to applaud the conductor could not wait for firmer ground.

It was Georges Longy, the big oboe, who, in the intermission after the next number, walked slowly off stage with a comically pensive air of "Where have I heard that tune before?" C. M. Loeffler came from Boston to hear his own "Pagan Poem." In its present new version, for orchestra, it is dedicated to the memory of a Christian gentleman. If we mistake not, the old version, for a handful of wind instruments, was once played here by the Longy Club.

Thanks to a telephone company that had some music in the place where its soul ought to be, and in this case it was its president who was invoked, there had been installed, in a matter of two hours or so, a telephone from the stage to an inner room. Manager Louis Salter was proud of the job.

Three trumpets and their assistant conductor, behind two sets of closed doors, played the soft airs of the absent Roman lover. A piano in the hands of H. Gebhardt, who used to look like a civilized human being before he grew his hair, represented the amateur sorceress and siren of Vergilian eclogue.

When the full orchestra went mad in modern idioms, you forgot whether it was Vergil or Loeffler "made Rome howl, sir!" but you were perfectly sure the fair Miss Simætha, of old Syracuse far away, had heard the errant Daphnis at last, "drawn by my songs," on his homeward way.

And then, O rare Edward MacDowell, there was such a setting forth of the best of "Indian Suites," in conclusion, as New York has not heard and will not hear in countless memorials. It wasn't Indian any more than Dvorak's "New World" is negro, save in themes. But there are pages of MacDowell as ringing as the rhapsodies of older lands.

Muck led with that cynical delight of his in making the fleeting moment fair with instant vision. To-night in Brooklyn his programme is of Handel, Haydn and Mozart; to-morrow, at the last matinée, it will be Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Two classic symphonies in both bills will be about enough, thank you. Dr. Muck did not "lead with his left hand" last evening, as reported, and he is not "sailing for Europe to-morrow." He has weeks of service in Boston yet.

From EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
Address
Date MAR 20 1908

MUCK'S LAST CONCERTS IN NEW YORK

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Receives an Ovation at Carnegie Hall—Is Obliged to Return to Germany.

The Boston Symphony concert given last night at Carnegie hall marked another milestone in the musical history of this country, and while enjoyment and appreciation were lavished upon the offerings of Dr. Muck, there were many who felt above all else a personal grief that this should have been the last evening of his sojourn here.

It is not strange that Germany should ask for the return of such a noted and notable conductor, and instead of resenting this desire on the part of his country to have him back, there should be only gratitude that instead of one season he should have been permitted to absent himself two seasons in our favor.

He has never been heard at the greatest possible advantage until very recently on account of the partial reorganizing of the orchestra which took place this season, and the point to which he has brought it within this short space of time proves the rapidity and the thoroughness in the work which is done behind the curtains, as it were.

Instead of a tribute offered to Dr. Muck by America upon the occasion of his last concert the order has been reversed and he paid a rare tribute to this country in the programme he offered, and in so doing planted himself inefaceably in the heart of every American who loves and who believes in the musical possibilities of this country.

The programme comprised "Jeanne d'Arc," a series of dramatic pictures by Frederic Converse, "a Pagan Poem" by Charles Martin Loeffler and MacDowell's "Indian" suite.

Mr. Converse was born at Newton, Mass., and is now living in a Boston suburb. Mr. Loeffler is an Alsatian, but he has been a resident of Boston for nearly twenty-five years and was formerly one of the great and vital forces of the orchestra which played so marvelously his work last night.

Mr. Converse's work is divided into five movements under subtitles of "In Domremy," "Pastoral Reverie," "Battle Hymn," "Night Vision" and "The Maid of God." The music, while not theatrical, is music for the theatre—it was originally written for the production of Percy Mackaye's drama, which was played last season by Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe. Mr. Converse has enlarged its form and has orchestrated it far beyond its original condition.

The writer has not attempted to keep aloof from melody for the sake of being "modern," and throughout it has beautiful themes which he has handled in an interesting and able manner. It is strongly rhythmic and well balanced. The "Battle Hymn" is frank realism, of the sort, however, which reveals what Mr. Converse could do did he elect to write an opera. The "Night Vision" is in admirable contrast and in its original form must have been of more intimate beauty than in this work, which is somewhat thickly orchestrated for the filmy material of which the movement is built.

The inclusion of Loeffler's composition upon what purported to be an all-American programme will no doubt bring forth the eternal discussion which will forever resolve itself into the question—Does blood or environment establish the nationality? This for those who interest themselves in the study of races, heredity and kindred subjects, but as a musical work, this latest creation from the pen of this man of genius is the message from the world and for the world unbounded by nationality or condition. It is the sort of work which one takes as one takes Brahms, or Strauss, or Debussy, and it is in the school of the latter that Loeffler finds his closest approach.

He is of the mind material of Maeterlinck, Debussy and one or two others, which for the lack of a more tangible name we call "mystics," or according to his own confession in tones, is he a pagan? He is certainly a musical heretic, but there is in this heresy much of wondrous beauty. "The Pagan Poem" is built upon suggestion of the Virgil poem, "The Sorceress," without following it as to framework.

Indeed, although Loeffler is an acknowledged devotee to programme music, the work heard last night can clearly stand alone; the deeply emotional context, the dim shifting of tonalities and the rarely beautiful orchestration carrying an intrinsic message, a message of music, definable and undefinable as well. The pianoforte obligato was played by Heinrich Gebhard with excellent taste and with strong feeling ...requirements ... artistic to efface ... the effect of the whole.

The programme closed with MacDowell's "Indian" suite, which is not new to the Boston Symphony audiences, but which was played last night with exquisite qualities and which made its own eloquent appeal.

Dr. Muck was accorded a very affectionate reception and was presented with a laurel wreath. The last matinee and final concert will occur Saturday.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.
MAR 20 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

At the local concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Dr. Karl Muck is making his farewell appearances in New York. For the concert at Carnegie Hall last night he chose a programme of American music. "Jeanne d'Arc," a suite of "dramatic scenes for orchestra," by Frederick S. Converse, C. M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and MacDowell's "Indian" suite were the pieces selected. And yet it is not quite accurate to describe this programme as American. Mr. Loeffler is a native of Alsace and belongs in sympathies and manner to the modern French school of composition. Only by accident of residence is he an American.

The first number on the programme, Mr. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," is a suite arranged from incidental music written by Mr. Converse for Percy Mackaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc," which Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern produced last season. Mr. Converse himself described the music for the play in part as follows:

"While the music follows somewhat the lines of incidental music written by Mendelssohn for 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' by Bizet for 'L'Arlésienne,' and by Grieg for 'Peer Gynt,' it is more modern in treatment and style. It approaches the problem of dramatic expression from a broader and more highly organized standpoint, and uses to a certain extent the 'leading motive' plan which obtains in modern opera."

Mendelssohn, Bizet, Grieg, Converse. In spite of the advantages of a "more modern treatment and style," and "a broader and more highly organized standpoint," even as a table land to a church spire, Mr. Converse may consider himself lucky if his suite interests for as many years as the music of Mendelssohn, Bizet, and Grieg. Last night it was mainly impressive for its length, which to some hearers seemed interminable.

The feature of the concert was Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." "This tone poem," says Mr. Hale's programme note, "was suggested to Mr. Loeffler by certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, which is sometimes known as 'Pharmaceutria' (the Sorceress). The Eclogue, dedicated to Pollio, was written probably in 39 B. C. It consists of two love songs—that of Damon and that of Alphesiboeus. Each song has ten parts, and these parts are divided by a recurring burden, or refrain. Alphesiboeus tells of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who by the aid of magical spells endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover, Daphnis.

"Mr. Loeffler does not intend to present in this music a literal translation of Virgil's verse into tones. The poem is a fantasy, inspired by the verses. The chief themes, with the possible exception of one, are not typical; they are only of musical significance. The refrain—'Ducite ab urbe domum, mea carmina, ducite Daphnim'—is used sparingly, and is given to three trumpets behind the scenes, until Daphnis nears the doors of the sorceress, when the final refrain, 'Parcite, ab urbe venit, jam parcite, carmina, Daphnis,' is suggested by the fanfare of three trumpets on the stage."

Without undue subservience to the verses Mr. Loeffler has written in this tone poem music of absorbing interest, of irresistible emotional appeal. Passion, despair, hope, and an exultation that is fairly barbaric speak in tones of an original and penetrating beauty. The forsaken woman, the spell she casts, her triumph in the return of her lover, these are wonderfully suggested rather than too literally portrayed. It is music that one cannot grasp in entirety at a single hearing, for Mr. Loeffler is a radical, and his idiom is the strange and fascinating language that emulators of Debussy employ. It is regrettable that a work of such importance, of such originality, is not to be heard again Saturday afternoon.

The "Pagan Poem" is scored for modern orchestra with piano, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati. The performance under the direction of Dr. Muck was one of superb intensity. Heinrich Gebhard performed the piano part with great skill, and Mr. Longy was unmistakable as the player of the English horn. The trumpet refrain played off the stage was conveyed into the audience room by a telephone arrangement with megaphone attachment.

The concert closed with MacDowell's "Indian" suite, which may well take its place as a classic of American music. Here, too, the performance of the orchestra was superlatively excellent. Dr. Muck is evidently leaving a host of admirers in New York. After the first number he was presented with a large wreath, and at the end of the concert he was recalled again and again.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 22 1908

Dr. Karl Muck wieder wohl.

Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, der an Ptomaine-Vergiftung leicht erkrankt war, ist fast vollständig wiederhergestellt.

From Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 21 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fifth and last concert of the twentieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn was given last night at the Baptist Temple, and it was also to be the farewell appearance here of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. As last night marked the close of the season, it was the intention of Brooklyn music lovers to tender him a farewell, but, unfortunately, Dr. Muck was attacked by ptomaine poisoning yesterday afternoon and so sick it was impossible for him to conduct the concert. His place was filled by Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra. The programme selected for last evening was very classical, interesting and consisted of the following works of Handel, Haydn and Mozart:

Concerto in M major for strings and two wind orchestras (edition of Gustav F. Kogel). First time in Brooklyn.....Handel
I. Pomposo.
II. Allegro.
III. A tempo ordinario.
IV. Largo.
V. Allegro.

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6).....Haydn
I. Adagio cantabile; Vivace assai.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto: Allegro molto; Trio.
IV. Allegro di molto.

Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart
I. Adagio; Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Finale: Presto.

The concerto of Handel is supposed to have been one of his later-day works, and is exceptionally beautiful. It was magnicently played by the orchestra. Prof. Wendling proved himself a master leader, had the orchestra well in hand, and every movement was given with wonderful precision. The second number, the Symphony in G major, called "The Surprise," of Haydn, was the most delightful and enjoyable part of the programme, especially so the second movement, andante with its simpleness and charming tunefulness, also the third movement, the Menuetto, the music of which was entrancing. The concert closed with Mozart's Symphony in D major. This was one of the forty-nine symphonies Mozart composed in his short life of thirty-five years, and, like all the music of that wonderful and gifted man, its harmonies and melodies are most brilliant. The most beautiful part of this symphony is the second movement, and in this is contained an example of the charm and grace of Mozart's compositions that has made his music loved so much. During the concert and at its close the audience was enthusiastic in its applause, and the good work of Prof. Wendling was liberally rewarded with hand-clapping. He was compelled to bow his acknowledgements repeatedly.

TIMES,
New York City.
MAR 22 1908

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Ends Its New York Season—Dr. Muck's Great Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its New York season yesterday afternoon with a concert in Carnegie Hall devoted to the elder classics—to Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. In this concert Dr. Muck took leave of New York, for his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends with the season in Boston, and he must return to Berlin. His admirers—and they must surely number all who have heard his concerts in the two seasons he has conducted the Boston Orchestra here—will hope that his absence will be but for a time.

That is for the future to determine. But music lovers of New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor with gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to be. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston Orchestra, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. And it is giving Dr. Muck the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes are always those of the composer. His stay with the Boston Orchestra has maintained the standard and the traditions of that organization, and has been a benefit and a stimulus.

Of the performance yesterday there is little to say. Dr. Muck conducts the music of the classical masters not only with devotion and reverence, but also with zest and with a keen perception that it is alive and that it lives because it has vital qualities with which its interpretation is to be infused. He conducted yesterday under a double disadvantage due to the affection of the arm that caused him to spare it noticeably on Thursday night, and to an added indisposition that laid him low on the following day.

However, these personal ailments were not reflected in his performance of the music, which was well-nigh flawless. All three of the compositions played were light-hearted in character and congruous with the Spring day outside. The "Surprise Symphony" was played with delicacy, lightness, and grace. Seldom has the "Figaro" overture shimmered so dazzlingly. Taken at a swift tempo the inherent joy of the music was wonderfully expressed. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which followed the intermission, if more serious in tone, is quite as pleasant melody as the numbers which came before.

The audience was loath to let Dr. Muck go, and after the concert he was recalled to the platform many times.

...m ...FOLK
...dress ...YORK CITY
...te ...MAR 15 1908

— Dr. Karl Muck, der ausgezeichnete Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, erkrankte gestern urplötzlich so heftig, daß er sich sofort in ärztliche Pflege begeben mußte. Glücklicherweise ist sein Leiden nicht ernster Natur; bereits am gestrigen Abende konnten die Aerzte erklären, daß es sich nur um einen akuten Anfall einer sehr leichten Ptomainvergiftung handelte und während der Nacht besserte sich Muck's Befinnden derart, daß begründete Aussicht vorhanden ist, der vielbewährte Musiker werde schon morgen wieder „allright" sein.

From EVENING SUN, New York City.

Address

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON LEADER SAYS GOODBY IN PLAIN AMERICAN.

Philadelphia Goes Madly Rioting Down Locust and Broad Streets' Classic Shades After Tetrazzini and Hammerstein—Twenty Weeks of Metropolitan Opera Again Next Season, the Old Subscribers Are Told—Emma Eames Out of "Trovatore"—Kubelik Heard in Brooklyn—First "Fidelio" and Farewell "Pelleas" To-night.

Dr. Karl Muck's best audience in this town tried hard last night to kill him with kindness. But musicians as a race always did die hard. Even with his nerve-racked right arm, that had laid him up at Washington this week, the man was bound and determined to see all the fun there was coming to him at his round-up of New York farewells. He survived the heavy green wreath that was hurled upon Carnegie Hall's stage after the first musical number last evening. He would have sidestepped so weighty a prize. But the mighty dean of ushers, Tom Holahan, waved the offering at his feet until this frail and delicate musician stooped down, executed a dexterous "left hook" that we commend to the emulation of strenuous greatness at Berlin or elsewhere, and carried off the honors of the night with a crook of his uninjured elbow and a smile.

An all-American programme was Muck's parting bit of pleasantry that will be kindly remembered here. The "Jeanne d'Arc" of Converse was put forward modestly as curtain-raiser. Barring its ancient battle hymn of "Veni, Creator Spiritus," it was little better than theatre music in concert. It could only have been worse as absolute music in the theatre play it was written for. That, at least, we were spared. But those who wanted to applaud the conductor could not wait for firmer ground.

It was Georges Longy, the big oboe, who, in the intermission after the next number, walked slowly off stage with a comically pensive air of "Where have I heard that tune before?" C. M. Loeffler came from Boston to hear his own "Pagan Poem." In its present new version, for orchestra, it is dedicated to the memory of a Christian gentleman. If we mistake not, the old version, for a handful of wind instruments, was once played here by the Longy Club.

Thanks to a telephone company that had some music in the place where its soul ought to be, and in this case it was its president who was invoked, there had been installed, in a matter of two hours or so, a telephone from the stage to an inner room. Manager Louis Salter was proud of the job.

Three trumpets and their assistant conductor, behind two sets of closed doors, played the soft airs of the absent Roman lover. A piano in the hands of H. Gebhardt, who used to look like a civilized human being before he grew his hair, represented the amateur sorceress and siren of Vergilian eclogue.

When the full orchestra went mad in modern idioms, you forgot whether it was Vergil or Loeffler "made Rome howl, sir!" but you were perfectly sure the fair Miss Simaetha, of old Syracuse far away, had heard the errant Daphnis at last, "drawn by my songs," on his homeward way.

And then, O rare Edward MacDowell, there was such a setting forth of the best of "Indian Suites," in conclusion, as New York has not heard and will not hear in countless memorials. It wasn't Indian any more than Dvorak's "New World" is negro, save in themes. But there are pages of MacDowell as ringing as the rhapsodies of older lands.

Muck led with that cynical delight of his in making the fleeting moment fair with instant vision. To-night in Brooklyn his programme is of Handel, Haydn and Mozart; to-morrow, at the last matinée, it will be Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Two classic symphonies in both bills will be about enough, thank you. Dr. Muck did not "lead with his left hand" last evening, as reported, and he is not "sailing for Europe to-morrow." He has weeks of service in Boston yet.

From

Address

Date

— Dr. Karl Muck, der ausgezeichnete Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orcheiters, erkrankte gestern urplötzlich so heftig, daß er sich sofort in ärztliche Pflege begeben mußte. Glücklicherweise ist sein Leiden nicht ernster Natur; bereits am gestrigen Abende konnten die Ärzte im Manhattan Hotel pflegenden ihn im Manhattan Hotel pflegenden Ärzte erklären, daß es sich nur um einen akuten Anfall einer sehr leichten Ptomainvergiftung handelte und während der Nacht besserte sich Muck's Befinnden derart, daß begründete Aussicht vorhanden ist, der vielbewährte Musiker werde schon morgen wieder „allright" sein.

, 18

From EVENING MAIL, New York City.

Address

Date MAR

MUCK'S LAST CONCERTS IN NEW YORK

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Receives an Ovation at Carnegie Hall — Is Obliged to Return to Germany.

The Boston Symphony concert given last night at Carnegie hall marked another milestone in the musical history of this country, and while enjoyment and appreciation were lavished upon the offerings of Dr. Muck, there were many who felt above all else a personal grief that this should have been the last evening of his sojourn here.

It is not strange that Germany should ask for the return of such a noted and notable conductor, and instead of resenting this desire on the part of his country to have him back, there should be only gratitude that instead of one season he should have been permitted to absent himself two seasons in our favor.

He has never been heard at the greatest possible advantage until very recently on account of the partial reorganizing of the orchestra which took place this season, and the point to which he has brought it within this short space of time proves the rapidity and the thoroughness in the work which is done behind the curtains, as it were.

Instead of a tribute offered to Dr. Muck by America upon the occasion of his last concert the order has been reversed and he paid a rare tribute to this country in the programme he offered, and in so doing planted himself ineffaceably in the heart of every American who loves and who believes in the musical posssibilities of this country.

The programme comprised "Jeanne d'Arc," a series of dramatic pictures by Frederic Converse, "a Pagan Poem" by Charles Martin Loeffler and MacDowell's "Indian" suite.

Mr. Converse was born at Newton, Mass., and is now living in a Boston suburb. Mr. Loeffler is an Alsatian, but he has been a resident of Boston for nearly twenty-five years and was formerly one of the great and vital forces of the orchestra which played so marvelously his work last night.

Mr. Converse's work is divided into five movements under subtitles of "In Domremy," "Pastoral Reverie," "Battle Hymn," "Night Vision" and "The Maid of God." The music, while not theatrical, is music for the theatre—it was originally written for the production of Percy Mackaye's drama, which was played last season by Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe. Mr. Converse has enlarged its form and has orchestrated it far beyond its original condition.

The writer has not attempted to keep aloof from melody for the sake of being "modern," and throughout it has beautiful themes which he has handled in an interesting and able manner. It is strongly rhythmic and well balanced. The "Battle Hymn" is frank realism, of the sort, however, which reveals what Mr. Converse could do did he elect to write an opera. The "Night Vision" is in admirable contrast and in its original form must have been of more intimate beauty than in this work, which is somewhat thickly orchestrated for the filmy material of which the movement is built.

The inclusion of Loeffler's composition upon what purported to be an all-American programme will no doubt bring forth the eternal discussion which will forever resolve itself into the question—Does blood or environment establish the nationality? This for those who interest themselves in the study of races, heredity and kindred subjects, but as a musical work, this latest creation from the pen of this man of genius is the message from the world and for the world unbounded by nationality or condition. It is the sort of work which one takes as one takes Brahms, or Strauss, or Debussy, and it is in the school of the latter that Loeffler finds his closest approach.

He is of the mind material of Maeterlinck, Debussy and one or two others, which for the lack of a more tangible name we call "mystics," or according to his own confession in tones, is he a pagan? He is certainly a musical heretic, but there is in this heresy much of wondrous beauty. "The Pagan Poem" is built upon suggestion of the Virgil poem, "The Sorceress," without following it as to framework.

Indeed, although Loeffler is an acknowledged devotee to programme music, the work heard last night can clearly stand alone, the deeply emotional context, the dim shifting of tonalities and the rarely beautiful orchestration carrying an intrinsic message, a message of music, definable and undefinable as well. The pianoforte obligato was played by Heinrich Gebhard with excellent taste and with strong feeling and [illegible]

[illegible] is sufficiently artistic to efface self for the effect of the whole.

The programme closed with MacDowell's "Indian" suite, which is not new to the Boston Symphony audiences, but which was played last night with exquisite qualities and which made its own eloquent appeal.

Dr. Muck was accorded a very affectionate reception and was presented with a laurel wreath. The last matinee and final concert will occur Saturday.

* * *

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

AT the local concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Dr. Karl Muck is making his farewell appearances in New York. For the concert at Carnegie Hall last night he chose a programme of American music. "Jeanne d'Arc," a suite of "dramatic scenes for orchestra," by Frederick S. Converse, C. M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and MacDowell's "Indian" suite were the pieces selected. And yet it is not quite accurate to describe this programme as American. Mr. Loeffler is a native of Alsace and belongs in sympathies and manner to the modern French school of composition. Only by accident of residence is he an American.

The first number on the programme, Mr. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," is a suite arranged from incidental music written by Mr. Converse for Percy Mackaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc," which Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern produced last season. Mr. Converse himself described the music for the play in part as follows:

"While the music follows somewhat the lines of incidental music written by Mendelssohn for 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' by Bizet for 'L'Arlésienne,' and by Grieg for 'Peer Gynt,' it is more modern in treatment and style. It approaches the problem of dramatic expression from a broader and more highly organized standpoint, and uses to a certain extent the 'leading motive' plan which obtains in modern opera."

Mendelssohn, Bizet, Grieg, Converse. In spite of the advantages of a "more modern treatment and style," and "a broader and more highly organized standpoint," even as a table land to a church spire, Mr. Converse may consider himself lucky if his suite interests for as many years as the music of Mendelssohn, Bizet, and Grieg. Last night it was mainly impressive for its length, which to some hearers seemed interminable.

The feature of the concert was Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." "This tone poem," says Mr. Hale's programme note, "was suggested to Mr. Loeffler by certain verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil, which is sometimes known as 'Pharmaceutria' (the Sorceress). The Eclogue, dedicated to Pollio, was written probably in 39 B. C. It consists of two love songs—that of Damon and that of Alphesibœus. Each song has ten parts, and these parts are divided by a recurring burden, or refrain. Alphesibœus tells of the love incantation of a Thessalian girl, who by the aid of magical spells endeavors to bring back to her cottage her truant lover, Daphnis.

"Mr. Loeffler does not intend to present in this music a literal translation of Virgil's verse into tones. The poem is a fantasy, inspired by the verses. The chief themes, with the possible exception of one, are not typical; they are only of musical significance. The refrain—'Ducite ab urbe domum, mea carmina, ducite Daphnim'—is used sparingly, and is given to three trumpets behind the scenes, until Daphnis nears the doors of the sorceress, when the final refrain, 'Parcite, ab urbe venit, jam parcite, carmina, Daphnis,' is suggested by the fanfare of three trumpets on the stage."

Without undue subservience to the verses Mr. Loeffler has written in this tone poem music of absorbing interest, of irresistible emotional appeal. Passion, despair, hope, and an exultation that is fairly barbaric speak in tones of an original and penetrating beauty. The forsaken woman, the spell she casts, her triumph in the return of her lover, these are wonderfully suggested rather than too literally portrayed. It is music that one cannot grasp in entirety at a single hearing, for Mr. Loeffler is a radical, and his idiom is the strange and fascinating language that emulators of Debussy employ. It is regrettable that a work of such importance, of such originality, is not to be heard again Saturday afternoon.

The "Pagan Poem" is scored for modern orchestra with piano, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati. The performance under the direction of Dr. Muck was one of superb intensity. Heinrich Gebhard performed the piano part with great skill, and Mr. Longy was unmistakable as the player of the English horn. The trumpet refrain played off the stage was conveyed into the audience room by a telephone arrangement with megaphone attachment.

The concert closed with MacDowell's "Indian" suite, which may well take its place as a classic of American music. Here, too, the performance of the orchestra was superlatively excellent. Dr. Muck is evidently leaving a host of admirers in New York. After the first number he was presented with a large wreath, and at the end of the concert he was recalled again and again.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ess

MAR 23 1908

Dr. Karl Muck wieder wohl.

Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, der an Ptomaine-Vergiftung leicht erkrankt war, ist fast vollständig wiederhergestellt.

[176]

Union, Brooklyn, N. Y.

ess

MAR 21 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fifth and last concert of the twentieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn was given last night at the Baptist Temple, and it was also to be the farewell appearance here of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. As last night marked the close of the season, it was the intention of Brooklyn music lovers to tender him a farewell, but, unfortunately, Dr. Muck was attacked by ptomaine poisoning yesterday afternoon and so sick it was impossible for him to conduct the concert. His place was filled by Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra. The programme selected for last evening was very classical, interesting and consisted of the following works of Handel, Haydn and Mozart:

Concerto in M major for strings and two wind orchestras (edition of Gustav F. Kogel). First time in Brooklyn.....Handel
I. Pomposo.
II. Allegro.
III. A tempo ordinario.
IV. Largo.
V. Allegro.

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6).....Haydn
I. Adagio cantabile; Vivace assai.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto: Allegro molto; Trio.
IV. Allegro di molto.

Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart
I. Adagio; Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Finale: Presto.

The concerto of Handel is supposed to have been one of his later-day works, and is exceptionally beautiful. It was magnicently played by the orchestra. Prof. Wendling proved himself a master leader, had the orchestra well in hand, and every movement was given with wonderful precision. The second number, the Symphony in G major, called "The Surprise," of Haydn, was the most delightful and enjoyable part of the programme, especially so the second movement, andante with its simpleness and charming tunefulness, also the third movement, the Menuetto, the music of which was entrancing. The concert closed with Mozart's Symphony in D major. This was one of the forty-nine symphonies Mozart composed in his short life of thirty-five years, and, like all the music of that wonderful and gifted man, its harmonies and melodies are most brilliant. The most beautiful part of this symphony is the second movement, and in this is contained an example of the charm and grace of Mozart's compositions that has made his music loved so much. During the concert and at its close the audience was enthusiastic in its applause, and the good work of Prof. Wendling was liberally rewarded with hand-clapping. He was compelled to bow his acknowledgements repeatedly.

TIMES, New York City.

te MAR 22 1908

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Ends Its New York Season—Dr. Muck's Great Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its New York season yesterday afternoon with a concert in Carnegie Hall devoted to the elder classics—to Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. In this concert Dr. Muck took leave of New York, for his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends with the season in Boston, and he must return to Berlin. His admirers—and they must surely number all who have heard his concerts in the two seasons he has conducted the Boston Orchestra here—will nope that his absence will be but for a time.

That is for the future to determine. But music lovers of New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor [illegible] gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to be. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston Orchestra, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. And it is giving Dr. Muck the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes are always those of the composer. His stay with the Boston Orchestra has maintained the standard and the traditions of that organization, and has been a benefit and a stimulus.

Of the performance yesterday there is little to say. Dr. Muck conducts the music of the classical masters not only with devotion and reverence, but also with zest and with a keen perception that it is alive and that it lives because it has vital qualities with which its interpretation is to be infused. He conducted yesterday under a double disadvantage due to the affection of the arm that caused him to spare it noticeably on Thursday night, and to an added indisposition that laid him low on the following day.

However, these personal ailments were not reflected in his performance of the music, which was well-nigh flawless. All three of the compositions played were light-hearted in character and congruous with the Spring day outside. The "Surprise Symphony" was played with delicacy, lightness, and grace. Seldom has the "Figaro" overture shimmered so dazzlingly. Taken at a swift tempo, the inherent joy of the music was wonderfully expressed. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which followed the intermission, if more serious in tone, is quite as pleasant melody as the numbers which came before.

The audience was loath to let Dr. Muck go, and after the concert he was recalled to the platform many times.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1908

MUSIC.

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL.

It was with Beethoven that Dr. Karl Muck began here, two seasons ago, his ministrations as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and with Beethoven, again, he elected to make his farewell at yesterday afternoon's final concert of the winter's New York series of the Boston organization. Other orchestral leaders have done likewise in this city's musical experience, and since Beethoven is various enough to provide characteristic modes of expression for nearly any temperament likely to be found in serious musicians, the choice is easily understood. Dr. Muck's selection of the joyous fourth symphony yesterday was altogether felicitous, not only as bringing to a happy culmination a programme beginning with Haydn's "Surprise" symphony and the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," but in a more personal sense, as fitting singularly well his own artistic make-up. So far as his deeply interesting activities have revealed Dr. Muck's musical individuality to New York concert audiences, his natural utterance leans rather toward what is poised and balanced and restrained than toward the broadly heroic style. There have been evidences in plenty of his readiness to give reasonable rein to the heroic elements in music both old and new, but it is scarcely by his interpretation of grandiose emotional communications that Dr. Muck will be remembered here. Rather will grateful lovers of musical art recall such spirited and brilliant achievements as his recent performance of Max Reger's variations and fugue, or, to look further and higher, Dr. Muck's memorable and uplifting presentation of the Brahms symphony in C minor, at the outset of his New York doings. This latter proclamation, indeed, could not be easily forgotten by any sensitive hearer who had the good fortune to share in its enjoyment. And there might be many other occasions cited here wherein general delight was taken at the time, due largely to the sane, appreciative and penetrating musicianship of this Berlin conductor, and to his unfailing determination to find and disclose the essential beauty and meaning of what he played

In accepting the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck acquired command of a noble instrument of artistic expression. It is part of his two years' record in America that he has used this instrument with rare skill and keen sympathy in furtherance of high ideals. He leaves it, moreover, in as superlative a state of efficiency as when he took it up. Listening yesterday to the clean-cut precision, the delicate nuancing and the fine muscularity of this orchestra, which is forceful but never ponderous, one may well believe that Dr. Muck relinquishes with regret his privileged post as its leader, even to return to his aristocratic Berlin duties.

Some notion of the regard in which conductor and orchestra are held in this city was given by the size and attitude of yesterday's audience.

Though there was no singer or pianist to be heard alone, and though the programme contained only the three classic compositions already mentioned, all of them familiar for longer, probably, than any of yesterday's hearers could remember, Carnegie Hall was thronged with eager listeners, and at the end there were sincere and hearty recalls for the departing musician. Dr. Muck's memory of American appreciation of his work will be based on substantial and gratifying evidence.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, gave its closing concert of the season and Dr. Muck played his farewell to New York.

The rather severely classical programme, Haydn's "Surprise" or "Drum Beat" symphony, Mozart's "Figaro" overature and Beethoven's fourth symphony, because the latter work was heard last Sunday at the third concert of the Beethoven Cycle, gave an opportunity for comparison at short range between the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras which was instructive.

While the one is a single magnificent instrument an orchestral personality with a characteristic compact tone, the other, as yet, is an excellent body of musicians playing more or less well together but without distinctive individuality.

I have heard the Boston Orchestra play more precisely than in the first movement of the Haydn symphony, but the andante containing the "Surprise" and the pianissimo preceding the famous drum beat was exquisite. Wonderful the art in interpretation that can make the simplicity of Haydn so vital and full of color and contrast. The Mozart overture was another example of clear, balanced and rarely finished orchestral work hard to excel.

The Beethoven symphony closed an unusually short programme. Dr. Muck views his Beethoven romantically, pictorially. The symphonic picture fairly glowed with varied tints, and the work took on new form and meaning from his highly thoughtful and polished reading. The orchestral voices in answering phrases seemed to speak almost in words the poetic message of the composer. The andante was pure romance and poetry; the finale masterly.

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 190

[illegible] Waves Sunday to New York.

Though suffering severely from the effects of poisoning, which on Friday evening had prevented him from conducting the Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck appeared with his band of virtuosos yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to make his final bow to New Yorkers. Extreme pallor was the only visible sign of the great leader's indisposition. In his conducting there was not the slightest token of limpness or fatigue.

Haydn's symphony in G major, generally known as the "Surprise" symphony, was given with a fine attention to expressive shading and with great rhythmical spirit. It was a reading containing much that was modern in dynamic contrast and phrasing, but taking no unwarranted liberties. Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" was performed with much spirit.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which closed the concert, revealed Muck again as a Beethoven conductor of the highest attainments. At the end of the concert Dr. Muck was recalled repeatedly. A pity that the Emperor of Germany craves his services. With Dr. Muck's departure Americans will lose one of the most satisfactory conductors who has visited this country in many years.

From EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

MAR 21 1908

TELEPHONE HELPED KEEP THE PITCH

At the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie hall Thursday night Dr. Muck secured highly successful results in the trumpet obligati when Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was given, the trumpets being played behind the stage. As music lovers are aware, there is very often failure to maintain harmony of pitch and rhythm between an orchestra and instruments when the latter are in use behind the stage.

Thursday night this lack of harmony was entirely overcome. There was placed near the wall, so that the trumpets could catch through it every strain of the orchestral music, a telephone. Over the transmitter was fitted a large megaphone. By this means the trumpets were enabled to keep perfect pitch and rhythm with the orchestra, and to the audience it seemed as if the players were on the stage and not hidden behind the wall.

From NEWS

BALT.

DR. MUCK UNABLE TO APPEAR

Is Suffering From Injury To Arm—Was To Have Made Farewell To Baltimore This Evening.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is suffering from an injury to the nerves of his right arm, and will not be able to appear this evening at the Lyric, when the great Orchestra gives its last concert of the present season. It is stated that Dr. Muck's injury, while not serious, makes it impossible for him to wield the baton. Carl Wendling, the orchestra's concertmeister, will occupy Dr. Muck's place at the conductor's desk.

Peculiar regret will be felt in Baltimore at the announcement that Dr. Muck cannot conduct because he would have made his farewell appearance in this city this evening. His connection with the Boston Orchestra ends at the close of the present season, and he will return to Germany.

Dr. Muck was unable to conduct at the concert in Washington last night, but said yesterday that he thought he would be able to appear in Baltimore this evening. He sent a telegram to Mr. F. F. Comee, business manager of the Orchestra, today, however, saying that he found himself still too much crippled to attempt to lead the orchestra.

The programme of this evening's concert includes Haendel's Concerto for the two wind choirs and orchestra, Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

From EVENING POST,

New York City.

MAR 21 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been chosen successor of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be a stranger to Bostonians, but he is known to concert-goers in this city, as he was one of the "guest conductors" of the Philharmonic Society in 1905. He is at present conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic, and has also won fame in Paris, Madrid, and St. Petersburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil at the Leipsic Conservatory. He first wielded the conductor's baton in 1894. He has also composed a symphony, some chamber music, songs, and pianoforte pieces. Concerning his doings at the Philharmonic concert on December 15, 1905, the Evening Post said among other things:

Max Fiedler is a man of authority, a born commander. . . . He had a remarkably firm grip on his players, compelling them, though they had never seen him till a week ago, to do his every bidding, to play with remarkable precision, and follow his nuances with promptness. . . . He evidently has a fine sense of tempo, and of the frequent but slight modifications of it called for in Wagner's later works. The strings, under his command, revealed a splendid sonority, the woodwind played their finely interwoven melodies beautifully, and the brasses played with a pomp that made one fancy the curtain was up, and the Mastersingers marching in solemn procession. It was most enjoyable, and the audience was stirred to such enthusiasm that one might have fancied Safonoff was there conducting Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique." An excellent performance was also given of R. Strauss's "Don Juan." . . . In the Beethoven symphony (No. 5) there was nothing new to reveal. The hundred or so previous performances of it in Carnegie Hall had pretty well exhausted all possible interpretations. . . . Mr. Fiedler's was far from being metronomic, yet it avoided all eccentricities of reading. The slow movement was applauded with special cordiality.

Bizet not only left an immortal opera, but a son, who may or may not share the fame of "Carmen." His name is Jacques. . . . has written an opera libretto, based on "Küfner von Nürnberg."

From NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

MAR 22 [illegible]

DR. KARL MUCK'S FAREWELL CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said goodby yesterday afternoon to a large audience assembled at Carnegie Hall. It was the final concert here this season of this orchestra and it was also the last concert which Dr. Muck is announced to conduct here. He goes to Boston to complete his work there, and then leaves for Europe to take up his post at the Berlin Royal Opera again. His successor, Mr. Fiedler, has already been engaged, and it is not stated by those in authority whether Dr. Muck will return to Boston or not after a year abroad.

When Dr. Muck appeared on the platform yesterday he was warmly greeted, and at the close of the concert the audience remained and applauded him until he appeared and bowed again and again. The orchestra players also arose and bowed. There were no official ceremonies. It is whispered that Dr. Muck will return to become the permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony in a year.

The concert was an enjoyable one, even if it was not a remarkably brilliant programme for a farewell occasion. It consisted of three numbers, all classics, and contained no soloist. The opening number was Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, then followed Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" Overture, and the concluding work was Beethoven's lovely Fourth Symphony. The work of the orchestra was almost impeccable, and Dr. Muck led with fine spirit.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address [illegible]

Date MAR 18 1908

LAST CONCERT OF THE SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Fifth Performance.

Mr. Wendling Conducts—No Soloist and Programme Light in Motifs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its series of concerts for this season yesterday afternoon, giving the fifth performance at the National Theater before a large and enthusiastic audience.

As is customary at its first and last concert, there was no soloist. In the absence of Dr. Carl Muck, who was indisposed and unable to appear, Mr. Wendling conducted the orchestra, maintaining the standard of excellence which has long characterized the work of these musicians.

The programme varied in many ways from those the orchestra has given during the season, and might be designated as symphonic sketches of pastoral themes, so light and free from serious motifs was the entire programme.

Beethoven's Symphony in M major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68, in four movements, opened the performance. It was followed by Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28. Chabrier's overture, "Gwendoline," concluded the performance.

Special Clipping Bureau of The World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date MAR 18 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY [illegible]

Carl Wendling Conducts in Place of Dr. Muck, Who Is Ill.

Leader's Reading of Strauss' Number More Satisfactory Than Interpretation of Beethoven.

Dr. Carl Muck, whose final appearance in Washington was announced for yesterday afternoon at the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, was unable to conduct. He was suffering acutely from an injury to the nerves of his right arm, and not caring to direct with his left, the concert at the National Theater was given under the direction of the concert master, Carl Wendling. The programme included Beethoven's symphony No. 4 in B flat, opus 60, dedicated to Count Oppersdorf; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss, opus 28, and the overture to the opera "Gwendoline," by Emmanuel Chabrier, the French composer.

During the two years of Dr. Muck's conductorship in this country he has come to know the tastes of the American audience, and this season the Washington programmes have evidenced a discrimination and forethought of which no other visiting conductor of recent years, with the exception of Fritz Scheel, has seemed to think us worthy. The Beethoven symphony selected for performance yesterday is very seldom heard. It was performed in this city by the Georgetown Orchestra on April 13, 1885, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, March 26, 1894, and doubtless there may have been a few other renditions of it here at long intervals. But the musical world has come to hold the third, the fifth, and those symphonies following the fifth who so much favor that this one has almost dropped out of the prevailing concert repertoire.

Dr. Muck is to be thanked for reviving this gay, light-hearted exudation from a mind now identified with tense, terrible moods and cyclonic utterances. Were it not presumptuous to diagram the symphonies of a composer whose works have been the subjects of long analytical treaties, I should like to imagine this symphony to be the description of Beethoven's experiences at an afternoon tea or other social function into which some one of those charming historical women acquaintances of the composer had contrived to inveigle him. Excepting for a gloomy touch in the first movement, the symphony abounds with a lightness, daintiness, and beauty which are entirely foreign to the seriousness, harshness, and impetuosity which usually characterize this master's works.

Here he has forgotten momentarily the problem of life and death, has pushed aside shadowy Fate, which is knocking at the door, and has become an everyday mortal, reveling in the small talk and friendly gossip of his friends. In the last movement, the busy hum of strings in the lower voices tells of lightsome chatter, and even the bassoon lays aside his uncouth manners, assumes a polish quite unnatural to one so gruff and dictatorial, and does not forget to bid adieu to his hostess, with Chesterfieldian suavity and graciousness. The melodies carried by the string section in the second movement are quaint in the simplicity of their scoring, and the whole composition breathes the spirit of femininity, of brightness, happiness, and good cheer.

The Strauss work has been performed here twice before, once by Fritz Scheel, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and again in an arrangement by Sousa's Band. The performance of the work yesterday was the most clearly defined and the most spirited ever given in this city. The sprightly theme of Till, played upon clarient and flute, and the solo violin part toward the last, are only two examples of the finish and perfection with which the more individual portions of the work were brought out into relief. Mr. Wendling's reading of this number was far more satisfactory than his interpretation of Beethoven, which was conscientious, but not distinguished. The Chabrier overture was given with zest and eclat, but displayed no exceptional virtuosity.

The annotations, which the audience studied yesterday with the usual careful solicitude, were problematical, not programmatical, in so far as they concerned the Beethoven symphony. For some reason, the programmes gave a long analysis of the Sixth symphony which served as a complete mystification to the more conscientious symphony devotees.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

From TARG[illegible]

[illegible]

MAR 19 1908

Madame Olga Samaroff, after a long burnee through the Middle West and Southwest, is returning East, primarily to play a number of times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet. With the latter organization she has already played in Buffalo and St. Louis, and with it she is to play in Cambridge, Boston, New York and Chicago [illegible] next month, and early in May she will sail for Europe, where she will stay at least a year.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date MAR 2 1908

MUSIC.

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL.

It was with Beethoven that Dr. Karl Muck began here, two seasons ago, his ministrations as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and with Beethoven, again, he elected to make his farewell at yesterday afternoon's final concert of the winter's New York series of the Boston organization. Other orchestral leaders have done likewise in this city's musical experience, and since Beethoven is various enough to provide characteristic modes of expression for nearly any temperament likely to be found in serious musicians, the choice is easily understood. Dr. Muck's selection of the joyous fourth symphony yesterday was altogether felicitous, not only as bringing to a happy culmination a programme beginning with Haydn's "Surprise" symphony and the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," but in a more personal sense, as fitting singularly well his own artistic make-up. So far as his deeply interesting activities have revealed Dr. Muck's musical individuality to New York concert audiences, his natural utterance leans rather toward what is poised and balanced and restrained than toward the broadly heroic style. There have been evidences in plenty of his readiness to give reasonable rein to the heroic elements in music both old and new, but it is scarcely by his interpretation of grandiose emotional communications that Dr. Muck will be remembered here. Rather will grateful lovers of musical art recall such spirited and brilliant achievements as his recent performance of Max Reger's variations and fugue, or, to look further and higher, Dr. Muck's memorable and uplifting presentation of the Brahms symphony in C minor, at the outset of his New York doings. This latter proclamation, indeed, could not be easily forgotten by any sensitive hearer who had the good fortune to share in its enjoyment. And there might be many other occasions cited here wherein general delight was taken at the time, due largely to the sane, appreciative and penetrating musicianship of this Berlin conductor, and to his unfailing determination to find and disclose the essential beauty and meaning of what he played

In accepting the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck acquired command of a noble instrument of artistic expression. It is part of his two years' record in America that he has used this instrument with rare skill and keen sympathy in furtherance of high ideals. He leaves it, moreover, in as superlative a state of efficiency as when he took it up. Listening yesterday to the clean-cut precision, the delicate nuancing and the fine muscularity of this orchestra, which is forceful but never ponderous, one may well believe that Dr. Muck relinquishes with regret his privileged post as its leader, even to return to his aristocratic Berlin duties.

Some notion of the regard in which conductor and orchestra are held in this city was given by the size and attitude of yesterday's audience.

Though there was no singer or pianist to be heard alone, and though the programme contained only the three classic compositions already mentioned, all of them familiar for longer, probably, than any of yesterday's hearers could remember, Carnegie Hall was thronged with eager listeners, and at the end there were sincere and hearty recalls for the departing musician. Dr. Muck's memory of American appreciation of his work will be based on substantial and gratifying evidence.

From EVENING POST.

Address New York City.

Date MAR 21 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been chosen successor of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be a stranger to Bostonians, but he is known to concert-goers in this city, as he was one of the "guest conductors" of the Philharmonic Society in 1905. He is at present conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic, and has also won fame in Paris, Madrid, and St. Petersburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. From 1877 to 1880 he was a scholarship pupil at the Leipsic Conservatory. He first wielded the conductor's bâton in 1894. He has also composed a symphony, some chamber music, songs, and pianoforte pieces. Concerning his doings at the Philharmonic concert on December 15, 1905, the Evening Post said among other things:

Max Fiedler is a man of authority, a born commander. . . . He had a remarkably firm grip on his players, compelling them, though they had never seen him till a week ago, to do his every bidding, to play with remarkable precision, and follow his nuances with promptness. . . . He evidently has a fine sense of tempo, and of the frequent but slight modifications of it called for in Wagner's later works. The strings, under his command, revealed a splendid sonority, the woodwind played their finely interwoven melodies beautifully, and the brasses played with a pomp that made one fancy the curtain was up, and the Mastersingers marching in solemn procession. It was most enjoyable, and the audience was stirred to such enthusiasm that one might have fancied Safonoff was there conducting Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique." An excellent performance was also given of R. Strauss's "Don Juan." . . . In the Beethoven symphony (No. 5) there was nothing new to reveal. The hundred or so previous performances of it in Carnegie Hall had pretty well exhausted all possible interpretations. . . . Mr. Fiedler's was far from being metronomic, yet it avoided all eccentricities of reading. The slow movement was applauded with special cordiality.

Bizet not only left an immortal opera, but a son, who may or may not share the fate of "Carmen." His name is Jacques, and he has written an opera libretto, based on Hoffmann's "Küfner von Nürnberg."

From WORLD.

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, gave its closing concert of the season and Dr. Muck played his farewell to New York.

The rather severely classical programme, Haydn's "Surprise" or "Drum Beat" symphony, Mozart's "Figaro" overature and Beethoven's fourth symphony, because the latter work was heard last Sunday at the third concert of the Beethoven Cycle, gave an opportunity for comparison at short range between the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras which was instructive.

While the one is a single, magnificent instrument, an orchestral personality with a characteristic compact tone, the other, as yet, is an excellent body of musicians playing more or less well together but without distinctive individuality.

I have heard the Boston Orchestra play more precisely than in the first movement of the Haydn symphony, but the andante containing the "Surprise" and the pianissimo preceding the famous drum beat was exquisite. Wonderful the art in interpretation that can make the simplicity of Haydn so vital and full of color and contrast. The Mozart overture was another example of clear, balanced and rarely finished orchestral work hard to excel.

The Beethoven symphony closed an unusually short programme. Dr. Muck views his Beethoven romantically, pictorially. The symphonic picture fairly glowed with varied tints, and the work took on new form and meaning from his highly thoughtful and polished reading. The orchestral voices in answering phrases seemed to speak almost in words the poetic message of the composer. The andante was pure romance and poetry; the finale masterly.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

MAR 21 1908

TELEPHONE HELPED KEEP THE PITCH

At the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie hall Thursday night Dr. Muck secured highly successful results in the trumpet obligati when Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was given, the trumpets being played behind the stage. As music lovers are aware, there is very often failure to maintain harmony of pitch and rhythm between an orchestra and instruments when the latter are in use behind the stage.

Thursday night this lack of harmony was entirely overcome. There was placed near the wall, so that the trumpets could catch through it every strain of the orchestral music, a telephone. Over the transmitter was fitted a large megaphone. By this means the trumpets were enabled to keep perfect pitch and rhythm with the orchestra, and to the audience it seemed as if the players were on the stage and not hidden behind the wall.

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

DR. KARL MUCK'S FAREWELL CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said goodby yesterday afternoon to a large audience assembled at Carnegie Hall. It was the final concert here this season of this orchestra and it was also the last concert which Dr. Muck is announced to conduct here. He goes to Boston to complete his work there, and then leaves for Europe to take up his post at the Berlin Royal Opera again. His successor, Mr. Fiedler, has already been engaged, and it is not stated by those in authority whether Dr. Muck will return to Boston or not after a year abroad.

When Dr. Muck appeared on the platform yesterday he was warmly greeted, and at the close of the concert the audience remained and applauded him until he appeared and bowed again and again. The orchestra players also arose and bowed. There were no official ceremonies. It is whispered that Dr. Muck will return to become the permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony in a year.

The concert was an enjoyable one, even if it was not a remarkably brilliant programme for a farewell occasion. It consisted of three numbers, all classics, and contained no soloist. The opening number was Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, then followed Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" Overture, and the concluding work was Beethoven's lovely Fourth Symphony. The work of the orchestra was almost impeccable, and Dr. Muck led with fine spirit.

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1908

Muck Waves Goodby to New York.

Though suffering severely from the effects of poisoning, which on Friday evening had prevented him from conducting the Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck appeared with his band of virtuosos yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to make his final bow to New Yorkers. Extreme pallor was the only visible sign of the great leader's indisposition. In his conducting there was not the slightest token of limpness or fatigue.

Haydn's symphony in G major, generally known as the "Surprise" symphony, was given with a fine attention to expressive shading and with great rhythmical spirit. It was a reading containing much that was modern in dynamic contrast and phrasing, but taking no unwarranted liberties. Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" was performed with much spirit.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which closed the concert, revealed Muck again as a Beethoven conductor of the highest attainments. At the end of the concert Dr. Muck was recalled repeatedly. A pity that the Emperor of Germany craves his services. With Dr. Muck's departure Americans will lose one of the most satisfactory conductors who has visited this country in many years.

NEWS

DR. MUCK UNABLE TO APPEAR

Is Suffering From Injury To Arm—Was To Have Made Farewell To Baltimore This Evening.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is suffering, from an injury to the nerves of his right arm, and will not be able to appear this evening at the Lyric, when the great Orchestra gives its last concert of the present season. It is stated that Dr. Muck's injury, while not serious, makes it impossible for him to wield the baton. Carl Wendling, the orchestra's concertmeister, will occupy Dr. Muck's place at the conductor's desk.

Peculiar regret will be felt in Baltimore at the announcement that Dr. Muck cannot conduct because he would have made his farewell appearance in this city this evening. His connection with the Boston Orchestra ends at the close of the present season, and he will return to Germany.

Dr. Muck was unable to conduct at the concert in Washington last night, but said yesterday that he thought he would be able to appear in Baltimore this evening. He sent a telegram to Mr. F. F. Comee, business manager of the Orchestra, today, however, saying that he found himself still too much crippled to attempt to lead the orchestra.

The programme of this evening's concert includes Haendel's Concerto for the two wind choirs and orchestra, Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

LAST CONCERT OF THE SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Fifth Performance.

Mr. Wendling Conducts—No Soloist and Programme Light in Motifs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its series of concerts for this season yesterday afternoon, giving the fifth performance at the National Theater before a large and enthusiastic audience.

As is customary at its first and last concert, there was no soloist. In the absence of Dr. Carl Muck, who was indisposed and unable to appear, Mr. Wendling conducted the orchestra, maintaining the standard of excellence which has long characterized the work of these musicians.

The programme varied in many ways from those the orchestra has given during the season, and might be designated as symphonic sketches of pastoral themes, so light and free from serious motifs was the entire programme.

Beethoven's Symphony in M major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68, in four movements, opened the performance. It was followed by Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28. Chabrier's overture, "Gwendoline," concluded the performance.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

8 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Carl Wendling Conducts in Place of Dr. Muck, Who Is Ill.

Leader's Reading of Strauss' Number More Satisfactory Than Interpretation of Beethoven.

Dr. Carl Muck, whose final appearance in Washington was announced for yesterday afternoon at the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, was unable to conduct. He was suffering acutely from an injury to the nerves of his right arm, and not caring to direct with his left, the concert at the National Theater was given under the direction of the concert master, Carl Wendling. The programme included Beethoven's symphony No. 4 in B flat, opus 60, dedicated to Count Oppersdorf; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss, opus 28, and the overture to the opera "Gwendoline," by Emmanuel Chabrier, the French composer.

During the two years of Dr. Muck's conductorship in this country he has come to know the tastes of the American audience, and this season the Washington programmes have evidenced a discrimination and forethought of which no other visiting conductor of recent years, with the exception of Fritz Scheel, has seemed to think us worthy. The Beethoven symphony selected for performance yesterday is very seldom heard. It was performed in this city by the Georgetown Orchestra on April 13, 1885, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, March 26, 1894, and doubtless there may have been a few other renditions of it here at long intervals. But the musical world has come to hold the third, the fifth, and those symphonies following the fifth with so much favor that this one has almost dropped out of the prevailing concert repertoire.

Dr. Muck is to be thanked for reviving this gay, light-hearted exudation from a mind now identified with tense, terrible moods and cyclonic utterances. Were it not presumptuous to diagram the symphonies of a composer whose works have been the subjects of long analytical treaties, I should like to imagine this symphony to be the description of Beethoven's experiences at an afternoon tea or other social function into which some one of those charming historical women acquaintances of the composer had contrived to inveigle him. Excepting for a gloomy touch in the first movement, the symphony abounds with a lightness, daintiness, and beauty which are entirely foreign to the seriousness, harshness, and impetuosity which usually characterize this master's works.

Here he has forgotten momentarily the problem of life and death, has pushed aside shadowy Fate, which is knocking at the door, and has become an everyday mortal, reveling in the small talk and friendly gossip of his friends. In the last movement, the busy hum of strings in the lower voices tells of lightsome chatter, and even the bassoon lays aside his uncouth manners, assumes a polish quite unnatural to one so gruff and dictatorial, and does not forget to bid adieu to his hostess with Chesterfieldian suavity and graciousness. The melodies carried by the string section in the second movement are quaint in the simplicity of their scoring, and the whole composition breathes the spirit of femininity, of brightness, happiness, and good cheer.

The Strauss work has been performed here twice before, once by Fritz Scheel, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and again in an arrangement by Sousa's Band. The performance of the work yesterday was the most clearly defined and the most spirited ever given in this city. The sprightly theme of Till, played upon clarient and flute, and the solo violin part toward the last, are only two examples of the finish and perfection with which the more individual portions of the work were brought out into relief. Mr. Wendling's reading of this number was far more satisfactory than his interpretation of Beethoven, which was conscientious, but not distinguished. The Chabrier overture was given with zest and eclat, but displayed no exceptional virtuosity.

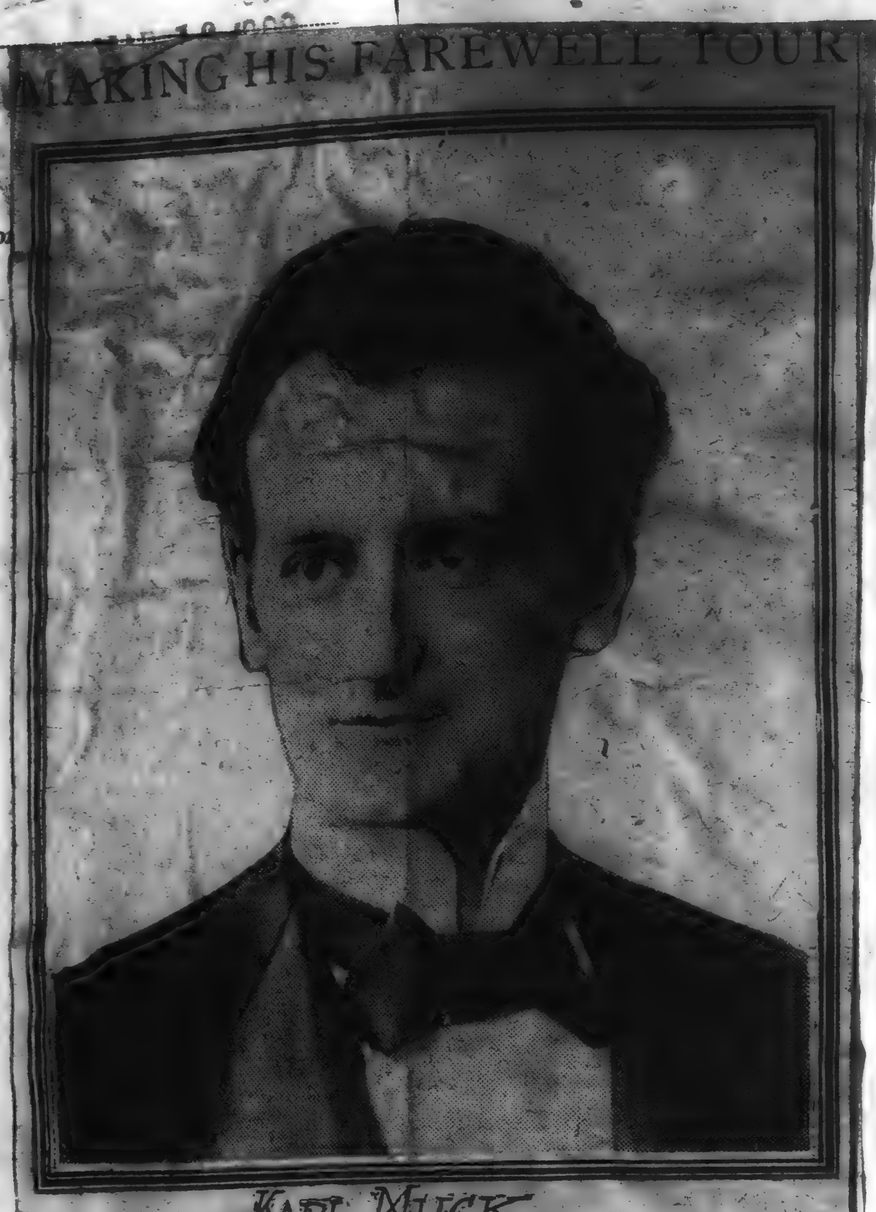
The annotations, which the audience studied yesterday with the usual careful solicitude, were problematical, not programmatical, in so far as they concerned the Beethoven symphony. For some reason, the programmes gave a long analysis of the Sixth symphony which served as a complete mystification to the more conscientious symphony devotees.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

Madame Olga Samaroff, after a long burnee through the Middle West and Southwest, is returning East, primarily to play a number of times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet. With the latter organization she has already played in Buffalo and St. Louis, and with it she is to play in Cambridge, Boston, New York and Chicago [illegible] next month, and early in May she will sail for Europe, where she will stay at least a year.

Clipping Bureau in the ...
NEW ...
...LYORE, MD
MAR 19 1908

MAKING HIS FAREWELL TOUR



KARL MUCK

Dr. Muck will be seen in Baltimore on next Wednesday night for the last time as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His final tour is proving a tremendous success. Great audiences have greeted him and the Orchestra, and the performances have been marked by extraordinary enthusiasm.

N. Y. Tribune - Mar 20

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

New and Old American Compositions.

Dr. Muck paid tribute to American music at the last of the evening concerts which he is to conduct here at Carnegie Hall last night. He made up his programme of compositions by Frederick S. Converse, Charles Martin Loeffler and Edward A. MacDowell. The first two were new, the last the "Indian Suite" which had figured on three or four schemes by local orchestras this season. Special interest in it was therefore enlisted only by its superior performance by the men from Boston and the obvious sympathy which Dr. Muck exhibited in its interpretation. If there were more of that aboriginal spirit in the composition which its title, the sub-titles over its various movements and its employment of a few Indian themes suggest, it would be a pleasant duty to discuss the reading given to it by the conductor; but Mr. MacDowell made no study of the characteristics of the musical idiom of the Indians, so far as their own performances are concerned, and Dr. Muck could not go beyond the printed page. All that can be said of last night's performance of the suite, therefore, is a word of praise for the brilliant quality of the band's playing and the completeness with which it performed its task.

Mr. Converse's contribution to the evening was a suite put together from the incidental music composed for Mr. Percy Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc." The suite was obviously made to save the music from the fate of the play. We fear that it will not prove an exception to the rule which time seems to have established for music of its character. Some of it—the second movement, for instance—has independent beauty whose appreciation does not call for the exercise of a fancy warmed by the incidents of the drama or the familiar tale of the Maid of Orleans; some of it will appeal in vain in spite of its dramatic or poetic association. What may be said of it in general in the way of approbation applies to its naturalness—conventionality, if the extremists prefer the word—of utterance at a time when there is a prevalent notion that the only new music worth listening to is that which subjects the old and accepted elements of the art to violence. Yet there are those—and they are not necessarily all Philistines (though the appellation is coming into good repute), who think with Selden and Goldsmith that many old things are most worthy of affection—old scales, old harmonies, old instrumental combinations even. Of course, we must have the new, and have them as Mr. Loeffler gave them to us last night in his "Pagan Poem," with its moments of exquisite imaginative as well as sensuous beauty. These moments, however, were episodic, and while listening to the composition, which we were invited to hear as music inspired by the eighth eclogue of Virgil, the conviction would not down that the piece had been laboriously built around the passage for three trumpets played in the distance, with its accompanying song from the English horn and pianoforte. That music sounded antique, if one must have it so, and sounded, moreover, like the evocation of an enchanter's wand, but much of that with which it is associated must wait till Debussy has completed his education of the Philistines before it can boast of being understood and admired. It was brilliantly played, of course, though it wrenched the neuritic right arm of Dr. Muck, which he spared as much as possible in conducting Mr. Converse's music and called for a telephone to aid the conductor off the stage, who had to give the cues to the hidden trumpeters.

H. E. K.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DR. MUCK'S LEAVE-TAKING IN NEW YORK

The Reviewers' Eulogies—More Letters About His Programmes—Mr. de Pachmann as an "Eccentric Entertainer"—The First Original American Play to Be Performed Throughout Europe—Mr. Fitch's "The Truth" Already Acted in Hungary, Italy, Germany and England, and to Be Mounted in France—An Interesting Note from the Playwright—Mr. Wendling to Conduct at the Symphony Concerts This Week with a New Programme—"The Thief" for Boston Next Autumn—Mr. Schroeder's Plans in America Next Year—Henry James's New Play to Be Acted This Week

On Saturday afternoon, at the final concert for the current season of the Symphony Orchestra in New York, Dr. Muck made his last appearance there as a conductor. All the pieces on his programme were classics—Haydn's "Surprise" symphony of the sudden drumbeat, Beethoven's fourth symphony and Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Wedding," as yet unplayed here under Dr. Muck. All three "numbers" are familiar; there was no assisting virtuoso, and thus the concert was practically Dr. Muck's own. Plainly it was for him that the audience filled Carnegie Hall and received and sped him with very hearty applause. Naturally, the reviewers of the New York newspapers use the occasion for general comment on Dr. Muck's conducting and the appreciation that it has won there in the past two years. Says the Sun, for example: "With yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall terminated, so far as New York is concerned, the activities of Karl Muck. He has endeared himself to the musical public of this city by qualities of the finest kind. Not only has he shown himself to be a musician of the most profound scholarship, but also of the widest and most polished taste. His veneration for the classics is equalled by his enthusiasm for the writers of today. He has directed with superb skill compositions by the old masters and the progressists of the current time. He has demonstrated in every instance his right to the title of interpreter.

"He has proved that an orchestra can be splendidly conducted without excitable gesticulation, but with repose and dignity. He has shown, too, that there were resources in the Boston Symphony Orchestra not previously disclosed. The tonal beauty of the playing of the organization has not diminished under his guidance, but it has gained in brilliancy and sonority. The orchestra was never before at such a high pitch of excellence as that at which he leaves it. It is a loss to music in this country to have him go away. But the German emperor, it seems, is unwilling to do without him any longer. For this we surely cannot blame his Imperial Majesty. If this writer were an emperor and had a conductor like Dr. Muck he would keep him at home, no matter how anxious Boston might be to borrow him for a year or two more."

The Times continues: "Music lovers of New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor of gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to be. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston orchestra, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. And it is giving Dr. Muck the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes are always those of the composer. His stay with the Boston orchestra has maintained the standard and the traditions of that organizations, and has been a benefit and a stimulant. Of the performance yesterday there is little to say. Dr. Muck conducts the music of the classical masters not only with devotion and reverence, but also with zest and with a keen perception that it is alive and that it lives because it has vital qualities with which its interpretation is to be infused. The "Surprise Symphony" was played with delicacy, lightness and grace. Seldom has the "Figaro" overture shimmered so dazzlingly. Taken at a swift tempo, the inherent joy of the music was wonderfully expressed. Beethoven's fourth symphony, which followed the intermission, if more serious in tone, is quite as pleasant melody as the numbers which came before. The audience was loth to let Dr. Muck go, and after the concert he was recalled to the platform many times."

The Tribune adds: "So far as his deeply interesting activities have revealed Dr. Muck's musical individuality to New York concert audiences, his natural utterance leans rather toward what is poised and balanced and restrained than toward the broadly heroic style. There have been evidences in plenty of his readiness to give reasonable rein to the heroic elements in music both old and new, but it is scarcely by his interpretation of grandiose emotional communications that Dr. Muck will be remembered here. Rather will grateful lovers of musical art recall such spirited and brilliant achievements as his recent performance of Max Reger's variations and fugue, or, to look further and higher, Dr. Muck's memorable and uplifting presentation of the Brahms symphony in C minor, at the outset of his New York doings. This latter proclamation, indeed, could not be easily forgotten by any sensitive hearer who had the good fortune to share in its enjoyment. And there might be many other occasions cited here wherein general delight was taken at the time, due largely to the sane, appreciative and penetrating musi[illegible] this Berlin conductor, and to [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck acquired command of a noble instrument of artistic expression. It is part of his two years' record in America that he has used this instrument with rare skill and keen sympathy in furtherance of high ideals. He leaves it, moreover, in as superlative a state of efficiency as when he took it up. Listening yesterday to the clean-cut precision, the delicate nuancing and the fine muscularity of this orchestra, which is forceful but never ponderous, one may well believe that Dr. Muck relinquishes with regret his privileged post as its leader, even to return to his aristocratic Berlin dutics. Dr. Muck's memory of American appreciation of his work will be based on substantial and gratifying evidence."

[178]

Our Programmes Again

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Without in any way wishing to enter into a controversy on Dr. Muck's programmes I would like to say a few words in reply to what "Music Lover" wrote in your issue of Friday. I am quite aware of the educational interest of the Symphony concerts, but cannot help reminding him that in the modern method the exhibition of the frightful example and also punishment are eliminated. It can hardly be necessary for such an audience to be subjected to listening to such compositions as Bischoff's Symphony twice over, to convince them that the Germany of the twentieth century is in music, as in all the fine arts, painting, sculpture or architecture, at a lower level than it has been for centuries.

SEASON TICKET HOLDER.

March 21.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I would hereby second the motion made by a writer in this column of your issue of the 16th, regarding a change in the programmes of the Symphony concerts for the rest of the season. I can also testify that the superabundance of "first time" compositions, and bombastic efforts that we have had thrust upon us this winter are far from satisfying or enjoyable to myself, as well as to many others who are regular attendants upon the concerts and we long for a return to the grand and beautiful works of the old masters whose compositions have stood the test of time; and we feel this is due to our true music lovers.

ANOTHER SYMPHONY PA[illegible]

March 22.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

MAR 21 1908

DR. KARL MUCK INDISPOSED.

Brooklyn friends of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were much disappointed last night on the occasion of the fifth and last concert of the organization given at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, by the announcement of the illness of Dr. Muck. He is recovering at the Hotel Manhattan from a slight attack of ptomaine poisoning. Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, conducted in his place.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ess New York City.

MAR 23 1908

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL.

FOR his farewell concert in New York, Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reverted to the classics, presenting a programme that consisted of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. On account of the neuritis that has attacked his right arm, Dr. Muck did not conduct the concert of the Boston orchestra in Brooklyn the previous evening. Mr. Wendling took his place. But Saturday Dr. Muck was at his post, and if any further proof were needed of his high ability as a conductor, he gave it.

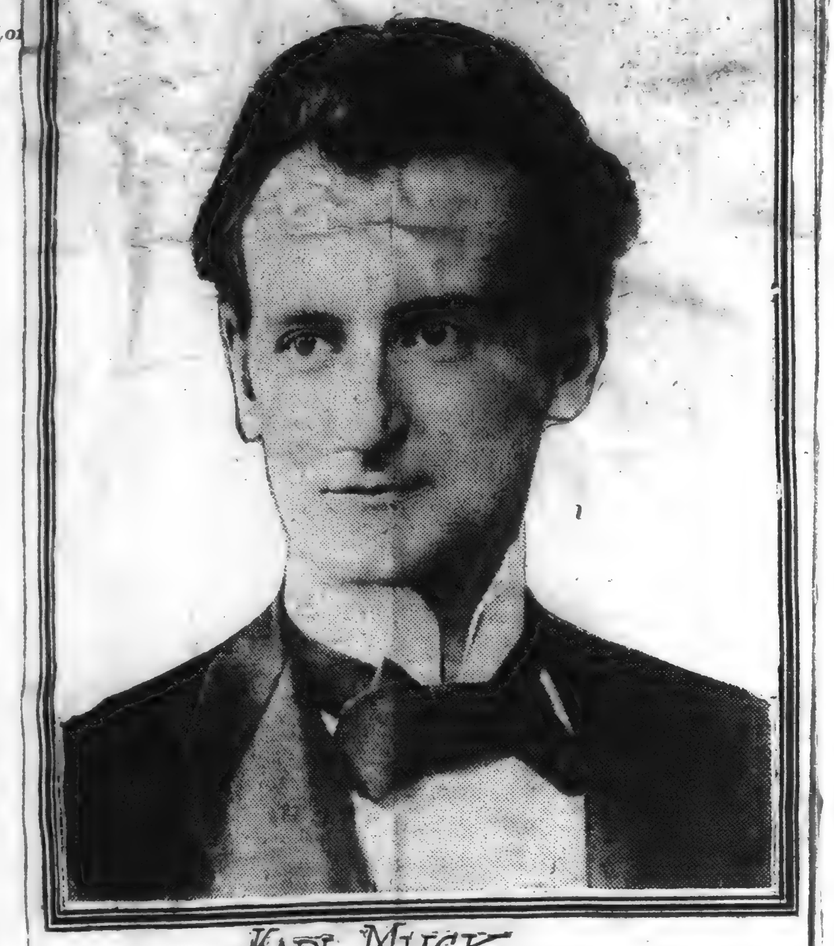
It is unnecessary to attempt here to recount the extraordinary merits of the performance of the overture and the two symphonies by the incomparable band from Boston under the masterly guidance of Dr. Muck. It is enough that the familiar music held the audience spellbound like a revelation of new beauty. More convincing proof of the excellence of both orchestra and conductor could not be desired.

The evident reluctance of the audience yesterday to part with Dr. Muck must be shared by the music loving public in general. Some fears were felt as to the possible deterioration of an extraordinary orchestra when Mr. Gericke left the band that he had brought to a pitch of excellence approaching perfection. Such fears were groundless. Dr. Muck leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra if possible a finer instrument than he found it.

Dr. Muck has invited much adverse criticism by his peculiar programmes. One is glad to forget his deficiencies as a programme maker in the memory of his splendid qualities as an interpretative artist. It is not too much to hope that after Dr. Muck has conducted opera a few years for the German emperor and Max Fiedler has presided for a time over the destinies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Dr. Muck will return to a post that for two seasons he has signally adorned.

Cutting Bureau in the World

MAKING HIS FAREWELL TOUR



KARL MUCK

Dr. Muck will be seen in Baltimore on next Wednesday night for the last time as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His final tour is proving a tremendous success. Great audiences have greeted him and the Orchestra, and the performances have been marked by extraordinary enthusiasm.

N. Y. Tribune. - Mar 28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

New and Old American Compositions.

Dr. Muck paid tribute to American music at the last of the evening concerts which he is to conduct here at Carnegie Hall last night. He made up his programme of compositions by Frederick S. Converse, Charles Martin Loeffler and Edward A. MacDowell. The first two were new, the last the "Indian Suite" which had figured on three or four schemes by local orchestras this season. Special interest in it was therefore enlisted only by its superior performance by the men from Boston and the obvious sympathy which Dr. Muck exhibited in its interpretation. If there were more of that aboriginal spirit in the composition which its title the sub-titles over its various movements and its employment of a few Indian themes suggest, it would be a pleasant duty to discuss the reading given to it by the conductor; but Mr. MacDowell made no study of the characteristics of the musical idiom of the Indians, so far as their own performances are concerned, and Dr. Muck could not go beyond the printed page. All that can be said of last night's performance of the suite, therefore, is a word of praise for the brilliant quality of the band's playing and the completeness with which it performed its task.

Mr. Converse's contribution to the evening was a suite put together from the incidental music composed for Mr. Percy Mackaye's drama, "Jeanne d'Arc." The suite was obviously made to save the music from the fate of the play. We fear that it will not prove an exception to the rule which time seems to have established for music of its character. Some of it—the second movement, for instance—has independent beauty whose appreciation does not call for the exercise of a fancy warmed by the incidents of the drama or the familiar tale of the Maid of Orleans; some of it will appeal in vain in spite of its dramatic or poetic association. What may be said of it in general in the way of approbation applies to its naturalness—conventionality, if the extremists prefer the word—of utterance at a time when there is a prevalent notion that the only new music worth listening to is that which subjects the old and accepted elements of the art to violence. Yet there are those—and they are not necessarily all Philistines (though the appellation is coming into good repute), who think with Selden and Goldsmith that many old things are most worthy of affection—old scales, old harmonies, old instrumental combinations even. Of course, we must have the new, and have them as Mr. Loeffler gave them to us last night in his "Pagan Poem," with its moments of exquisite imaginative as well as sensuous beauty. These moments, however, were episodic, and while listening to the composition, which we were invited to hear as music inspired by the eighth eclogue of Virgil, the conviction would not down that the piece had been laboriously built around the passage for three trumpets played in the distance, with its accompanying song from the English horn and pianoforte. That music sounded antique, if one must have it so, and sounded, moreover, like the evocation of an enchanter's wand, but much of that with which it is associated must wait till Debussy has completed his education of the Philistines before it can boast of being understood and admired. It was brilliantly played, of course, though it wrenched the neuritic right arm of Dr. Muck, which he spared as much as possible in conducting Mr. Converse's music and called for a telephone to aid the conductor off the stage, who had to give the cues to the hidden trumpeters.

H. E. K.

TRANSCRIPT MONDAY MARCH 23 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DR. MUCK'S LEAVE-TAKING IN NEW YORK

The Reviewers' Eulogies—More Letters About His Programmes—Mr. de Pachmann as an "Eccentric Entertainer"—The First Original American Play to Be Performed Throughout Europe—Mr. Fitch's "The Truth" Already Acted in Hungary, Italy, Germany and England, and to Be Mounted in France—An Interesting Note from the Playwright—Mr. Wendling to Conduct at the Symphony Concerts This Week with a New Programme—"The Thief" for Boston Next Autumn—Mr. Schroeder's Plans in America Next Year—Henry James's New Play to Be Acted This Week

On Saturday afternoon, at the final concert for the current season of the Symphony Orchestra in New York, Dr. Muck made his last appearance there as a conductor. All the pieces on his programme were classics—Haydn's "Surprise" symphony of the sudden drumbeat, Beethoven's fourth symphony and Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Wedding," as yet unplayed here under Dr. Muck. All three "numbers" are familiar; there was no assisting virtuoso, and thus the concert was practically Dr. Muck's own. Plainly it was for him that the audience filled Carnegie Hall and received and sped him with very hearty applause. Naturally, the reviewers of the New York newspapers use the occasion for general comment on Dr. Muck's conducting and the appreciation that it has won there in the past two years. Says the Sun, for example: "With yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall terminated, so far as New York is concerned, the activities of Karl Muck. He has endeared himself to the musical public of this city by qualities of the finest kind. Not only has he shown himself to be a musician of the most profound scholarship, but also of the widest and most polished taste. His veneration for the classics is equalled by his enthusiasm for the writers of today. He has directed with superb skill compositions by the old masters and the progressists of the current time. He has demonstrated in every instance his right to the title of interpreter.

"He has proved that an orchestra can be splendidly conducted without excitable gesticulation, but with repose and dignity. He has shown, too, that there were resources in the Boston Symphony ~~O~~rchestra not previously disclosed. The tonal beauty of the playing of the organization has not diminished under his guidance, but it has gained in brilliancy and sonority. The orchestra was never before at such a high pitch of excellence as that at which he leaves it. It is a loss to music in this country to have him go away. But the German emperor, it seems, is unwilling to do without him any longer. For this we surely cannot blame his Imperial Majesty. If this writer were an emperor and had a conductor like Dr. Muck he would keep him at home, no matter how anxious Boston might be to borrow him for a year or two more."

The Times continues: "Music lovers of New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor of gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to be. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston orchestra, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. And it is giving Dr. Muck the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes are always those of the composer. His stay with the Boston orchestra has maintained the standard and the traditions of that organizations, and has been a benefit and a stimulant. Of the performance yesterday there is little to say. Dr. Muck conducts the music of the classical masters not only with devotion and reverence, but also with zest and with a keen perception that it is alive and that it lives because it has vital qualities with which its interpretation is to be infused. The "Surprise Symphony" was played with delicacy, lightness and grace. Seldom has the "Figaro" overture shimmered so dazzlingly. Taken at a swift tempo, the inherent joy of the music was wonderfully expressed. Beethoven's fourth symphony, which followed the intermission, if more serious in tone, is quite as pleasant melody as the numbers which came before. The audience was loth to let Dr. Muck go, and after the concert he was recalled to the platform many times."

The Tribune adds: "So far as his deeply interesting activities have revealed Dr. Muck's musical individuality to New York concert audiences, his natural utterance leans rather toward what is poised and balanced and restrained than toward the broadly heroic style. There have been evidences in plenty of his readiness to give reasonable rein to the heroic elements in music both old and new, but it is scarcely by his interpretation of grandiose emotional communications that Dr. Muck will be remembered here. Rather will grateful lovers of musical art recall such spirited and brilliant achievements as his recent performance of Max Reger's variations and fugue, or, to look further and higher, Dr. Muck's memorable and uplifting presentation of the Brahms symphony in C minor, at the outset of his New York doings. This latter proclamation, indeed, could not be easily forgotten by any sensitive hearer who had the good fortune to share in its enjoyment. And there might be many other occasions cited here wherein general delight was taken at the time, due largely to the sane, appreciative and penetrating musicianship of this Berlin conductor, and to his unfailing determination to find and disclose the essential beauty and meaning of what he played.

[178]

"In accepting the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck acquired command of a noble instrument of artistic expression. It is part of his two years' record in America that he has used this instrument with rare skill and keen sympathy in furtherance of high ideals. He leaves it, moreover, in as superlative a state of efficiency as when he took it up. Listening yesterday to the clean-cut precision, the delicate nuancing and the fine muscularity of this orchestra, which is forceful but never ponderous, one may well believe that Dr. Muck relinquishes with regret his privileged post as its leader, even to return to his aristocratic Berlin duties. Dr. Muck's memory of American appreciation of his work will be based on substantial and gratifying evidence."

Our Programmes Again

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Without in any way wishing to enter into a controversy on Dr. Muck's programmes, I would like to say a few words in reply to what "Music Lover" wrote in your issue of Friday. I am quite aware of the educational interest of the Symphony concerts, but cannot help reminding him that in the modern method the exhibition of the frightful example and also punishment are eliminated. It can hardly be necessary for such an audience to be subjected to listening to such compositions as Bischoff's Symphony twice over, to convince them that the Germany of the twentieth century is in music, as in all the fine arts, painting, sculpture or architecture, at a lower level than it has been for centuries.

SEASON TICKET HOLDER

March 21.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I would hereby second the motion made by a writer in this column of your issue of the 16th, regarding a change in the programmes of the Symphony concerts for the rest of the season. I can also testify that the superabundance of "first time" compositions, and "bombastic efforts" that we have had thrust upon us this winter are far from satisfying or enjoyable to myself, as well as to many others who are regular attendants upon the concerts and we long for a return to the grand and beautiful works of the old masters whose compositions have stood the test of time; and we feel this is due to our true music lovers.

ANOTHER SYMPHONY PATRON

March 22.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

DR. KARL MUCK INDISPOSED.

Brooklyn friends of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were much disappointed last night on the occasion of the fifth and last concert of the organization given at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, by the announcement of the illness of Dr. Muck. He is recovering at the Hotel Manhattan from a slight attack of ptomaine poisoning. Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, conducted in his place.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ess New York City.

MAR 23 1908

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL.

FOR his farewell concert in New York, Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reverted to the classics, presenting a programme that consisted of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. On account of the neuritis that has attacked his right arm, Dr. Muck did not conduct the concert of the Boston orchestra in Brooklyn the previous evening. Mr. Wending took his place. But Saturday Dr. Muck was at his post, and if any further proof were needed of his high ability as a conductor, he gave it.

It is unnecessary to attempt here to recount the extraordinary merits of the performance of the overture and the two symphonies by the incomparable band from Boston under the masterly guidance of Dr. Muck. It is enough that the familiar music held the audience spellbound like a revelation of new beauty. More convincing proof of the excellence of both orchestra and conductor could not be desired.

The evident reluctance of the audience yesterday to part with Dr. Muck must be shared by the music loving public in general. Some fears were felt as to the possible deterioration of an extraordinary orchestra when Mr. Gericke left the band that he had brought to a pitch of excellence approaching perfection. Such fears were groundless. Dr. Muck leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra if possible a finer instrument than he found it.

Dr. Muck has invited much adverse criticism by his peculiar programmes. One is glad to forget his deficiencies as a programme maker in the memory of his splendid qualities as an interpretative artist. It is not too much to hope that after Dr. Muck has conducted opera a few years for the German emperor and Max Fiedler has presided for a time over the destinies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Dr. Muck will return to a post that for two seasons he has signally adorned.

Paper Cutting Bureau in ... for
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 19 1908

WENDLING DOES WELL IN MUCK'S ABSENCE

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES SEASON'S LAST CONCERT.

Injury To Noted Conductor Robs Evening Of Much Of Its Pleasure. A Programme Of Novelties.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert of the season at the Lyric last night should have been Dr. Muck's farewell to Baltimore, but the great conductor was ill and unable to lead. The performance was ably directed by Herr Wendling, the concert-master.

In his two years in America Dr. Muck has shown himself possessed of many professional virtues and one weakness. The first named are more than usually luxuriant in his case, and partially blind the public to his critical fault. Dr. Muck's virtues are comprehensive knowledge of all which is great in life (whether musical or otherwise), intuitive comprehension of tonal subtleties, a perfect sense of proportion in adjusting details or perspectives, absolute self-control and self-abnegation, magnetic control of those looking to him for direction and becoming modesty of gesture or while conducting. Dr. Muck's weakness is programme making. Boston, with her 20 yearly concerts, has been somewhat restive under his almost uninterrupted doses of novelties. We, with our five concerts, have had still greater cause for dissatisfaction. There have been some programmes during the two seasons which were so entirely experimental that they aroused a feeling of irritation in the hearers. Excepting this misjudgment in making selections, Dr. Muck has proved himself a master of masters—quite worthy of association with Nikisch, Hans Richter, Gericke and Colonne. These men all stand on a plane so high that the assertion of their musical ego, through superfluous motions while conducting, would be impossible.

Dr. Muck Earns Regards.

Mr. Gericke had endeared himself to the Baltimore public, and we all felt a painful wrench when he left us. Dr. Muck has not had so many years, nor the intimate intercourse, still his quiet, unostentatious masterfulness and refined gentility have earned the warm regard of all artistic natures. We shall miss him, however capable Max Fiedler may prove.

The following selections were presented last evening:

Concerto in F Major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras (edition of Gustav F. Kogel. First time in Baltimore) ..... Haendel
- Pompeso.
- Allegro.
- A tempo ordinario.
- Largo.
- Allegro.

Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller (1770), Op. 100. (First time in Baltimore.) ..... Reger

Caprice on Spanish Themes. Op. 34. (First time in Baltimore) ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
- Alborada.
- Variations.
- Alborada.
- Scene and Gipsy Song.
- Fandango of the Asturias.

Concerto Was Interesting.

The Haendel Concerto was interesting in its entirety and beautiful in spots. "Fatal facility," which today exerts a baneful influence on some composers—at times crowding the imagination out of the creative field—was a power to be feared, even in the Eighteenth Century. Bach was less often a sufferer from this debilitating malady than was Haendel; indeed, in the great cantor's work facility is made more entirely subservient to conception than it is in that of any other master. This concerto contains episodes which fell from the point of the pen and then again fascinating moments. The virtuosity of the wood-wind in the performance of this work was simply marvelous. The distinguishing feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is that whatever instrument or group of instruments is made to assume prominence during a performance, one feels the virtuoso's touch, and there is no feature of this great organization which so distinguishes it from all others as the playing of its eight contrabassi. Nothing like the violin playing of these men upon their big instruments can be heard elsewhere.

Max Reger has been a bone of contention for the past six years. His adherents, of whom there are many, would have him accepted as the composer of his generation; but the mass of the world's musicians and musical connoisseurs has arrived at no verdict as to his genius. Reger's audacity and contrapuntal skill are dazzling, but the harmonics and methods are too unconventional to be readily convincing. These "Variations and Fugue" have been played everywhere in Europe, and they have never failed to arouse active controversy as to their merits. Reger is certainly not a modest flower, to fade and die unnoticed. He will, if permitted, occupy the centre of the stage. As these Variations had been so much discussed, there was some justification for their performance here, but it would have been more agreeable had the balance of the programme been familiar music.

Variations Give Fine Practice.

The variation form affords students fine practice, for in it they are supposed to take a theme and use it as a lay figure upon which to drape all styles of work; endeavoring through this manipulation of externals to create contrasting phases. It is, however, a style of work better designed for the schoolroom than for the studio. Reger's redundant situations and moments of monotony in his [illegible] are not, however, caused by [illegible]

[illegible] Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice is unimportant as far as thematic material is concerned, but its diction is transparent and its instrumentation is beautiful.

Herr Wendling showed himself very resourceful, and the attitude of the orchestra toward him in his trying situation was delightful to see. The audience took pleasure in recognizing Herr Wendling's services. Dr. Muck's departure without a farewell is indeed sad.

O. B. B.

[illegible] with the orchestra at the concerts of next week promptly for her last appearances here before her departure to Europe for the long tour she purposes to make there next autumn. For the first time, moreover, in Boston, she will undertake Schumann's concerto.

EVENING MAIL,
From
Address New York City.
Date MAR 23 1908

Notable among the Saturday musical events was the final Boston Symphony concert. Those present did not know how close to a tragic finale was the concert of Thursday night. After the concert Dr. Muck was poisoned at an informal supper, most simple in nature. Three doctors worked over the eminent conductor all night, and although he did not direct the concert in Brooklyn, he was determined to pull together long enough to take his formal leave of the New York public in a programme which consisted entirely of classics. These were Haydn's Surprise symphony and Beethoven's Fourth symphony, between which the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" was given. A large audience was present.

From ...ATION.
NEW YORK CITY
Address
Date ...R 19 1908

Particular interest attaches to the last concerts to be given at Carnegie Hall this evening and Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They will mark the last appearances of Dr. Karl Muck, who has won many admirers here, but who is obliged to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera. k, 1

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
3

DR. MUCK IS WELL AGAIN

Was Able To Conduct Symphony Concert In Gotham Last Night—Presented A Wreath.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was prevented by an injury to his right arm from conducting at the last Baltimore concert of the present season at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, was able to resume his baton at last night's concert in New York.

Dr. Muck presented the New Yorkers a programme of American music, including Converse's "Jeanne D'Arc" suite, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." He was given a wreath by admirers in the audience.

n
PHILADELPHIA, PA
ress
e

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel; who is better known in concert [illegible] , 1

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
New York City.
38
MAR 24 1908

DR. MUCK had this to say in the Boston Post last week in regard to his successor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, who was a fellow student with him in Leipzig from 1878 to 1880:

"Of Mr. Fiedler's personality I can tell you little. When we were students together in Leipsic he was a quiet, reserved, very earnest, and ambitious worker. As you know, he was at that time very frail in appearance, and we feared that he would die of consumption. Though there were the most friendly relations between us all he had few intimates. He was always studying and was a prodigious pianist at that time. He rarely joined in our larks, and we saw little of him save in the class room, and occasionally, when he, a quiet observer, was present in the evening at some house.

"Neither he nor I conducted at the time. He is a self-made man in this respect as in others. It was later that he sprang into prominence in this capacity, by himself organizing and conducting a series of orchestral concerts in Hamburg. Since then his fame has spread with remarkable rapidity until there is now no conductor more well known in Europe. I know him to be a broad and most extensively educated musician, one well grounded in the classics, but a very ardent disciple of the [illegible] school. Of his characteristics as a [illegible] you [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 1908

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES FIND DEFENDERS

Today's Letters Give a New Turn to the Debate—Mme. Kalich Acts Her New Part in New York—A Pretty Theatrical Quarrel in Paris with the Academy, the Comedie-Francaise and the Government All Involved—Dr. Muck's Neuritis—Plays for the Hollis and the Colonial in May—Rudolf Ganz's Departure and Germaine Schnitzer's Return—Theatrical News of the Day

The Other Side Speaks

To the Editor of the Transcript:

We cannot hope to change the conservative attitude of your two correspondents of March 23, towards Dr. Muck's programme, but we trust their advice will not be followed. There are many conductors who are able to give us traditional interpretation of well-known music, but there are few who can reveal to us the new as well as glorify the old. While we have such a one let us appreciate the privilege, and make the most of it. The compositions of our own day may not be as universally enjoyable and inspiring as are the great works of the past which have "stood the test of time," but let us not refuse to put the work of our own day to a similar test, and let us be glad of an occasional opportunity to judge for ourselves as to its significance and worth without leaving it to future generations.

ANOTHER MUSIC LOVER

March 24.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

In re Dr. Muck's programmes, may it be permitted me to speak who would fain be numbered with the "younger set" but am constrained by the length of regular attendance, extending over nearly twenty years, at the Saturday evening concerts. I am, notwithstanding, delighted every time I note a "first time" upon a promised programme. Sibelius, Mahler, Strauss, Puccini, Jacques-Dalcroze, d'Indy, Elgar, Loeffler—are not the names and the more or less individualized schools and trends of thought they represent—are not the very nationalities that unconsciously to the hearer form a background to their music—are not their efforts to create something different in art, sufficient to whet a musical curiosity, to justify listening from the intellectual standpoint alone? All this apart from the question of individual appreciation. Granted an overwhelming majority in the audience of those whose pleasurable feelings are destroyed by consecutive fifths, unresolved sevenths, inexperienced progressions and all the stock damnanda, one could forego a personal delight in rich and strange orchestration, in strange and symbolic "atmospheres," in symbolic and fascinating rhythms. I had rather hear our Symphony Orchestra "tune up" than listen to most so-called "music" or not go at all.

But why draw this hard and fast line between the old and the new? My musical enjoyment is very keen when I hear good plain song. It is very high when I have the privilege of a Beethoven symphony. It is very eager while I listen to the "incantations" of Melisande. Why may we not enjoy a "Catholic Revival" in music, and are not Dr. Muck's programmes good material ad propagandam fidem—a catholicity literally comprehensive, not arrogated as a title by one line of tradition?

CAMBRIDGE

March 24.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

As one of the nine out of ten people who are dissatisfied with the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, I wish to offer a suggestion. If we are to have again Bischoff's symphony or other similar works, would it not add mightily to the cheerfulness of the evening if the programme were to state "Probably last time in Boston?" I feel that my greatest limitation in attempting to understand the present situation lies in the fact that I have never met the one man in ten who enjoys the recent programmes. It is my belief that he is more rare than is commonly supposed, and is, indeed, no other than

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved by concord of sweet sounds."

ANOTHER SYMPHONY PATRON

March 25.

Hugo Wolf's tone-poem, "Penthesilea," will not be played, after all, at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. To add it to Brahms's fourth symphony, Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," and Mr. Strube's two pieces for viola and orchestra, made the programme too long. Therefore "Penthesilea" goes over to a later pair of concerts. Dr. Muck, meanwhile, has fully recovered from the nervous strain of the trip to other cities last week; but the neuritis persists in his right arm; and he must rest it at least a week before he can use it again in conducting.

[179]

THE SYMPHONY [illegible]

Mr. Wendling Conducts Capably, Interestingly, and the Orchestra Him to the Utmost—Brahms [illegible] to Begin and to End the Programme with Mr. Strube's Little Tone-Poems for Viola and Orchestra Between—The [illegible] "Fantastic Dance"

A ripple of applause welcomed Mr. Wendling when he appeared first yesterday afternoon to conduct, in Dr. Muck's absence, at the Symphony Concert. At the close of each movement of Brahms's symphony in E-minor, with which the programme began, it waxed heartier, and from a departing audience, it was unusually warm at the end of the whole concert. An experienced concert-master though he is, Mr. Wendling is almost new to conducting; Dr. Muck's neuritis first disabled him in Washington and Baltimore last week; all unexpectedly Mr. Wendling had then to take the orchestra and perform, modestly, but no less heroically, the feat of leading it through Reger's tortuous Variations and Rimsky-Korsakoff's exacting "Spanish Caprice" without rehearsals—and with effect. Here at least he had his share in the choice of the pieces to be performed and opportunity to rehearse the orchestra in them. The men—quick and shrewd judges of a conductor suddenly set over them—had answered to him in Baltimore and Washington and done all that they might to aid.

They were not less responsive and helpful yesterday, and the esprit du corps of the whole band was good to feel. Sometimes we listeners are prone to forget that the Symphony Orchestra is a living institution in its men as well as its conductor, and that at need they can bear their part in an emergency and bear it heartily and well. They made the path of Mr. Wendling as easy as they could, and, doing so, they were loyal to their work, the orchestra and themselves.

Moreover, the major piece on the programme—Brahms's symphony in E [illegible] —happened to suit Mr. Wendling's [illegible] admirably. Last autumn, when as a new violinist, he played Brahms's concerto, he showed both sympathy and aptitude for the composer's music, and yesterday his conducting of the symphony confirmed both. He read the music [illegible] but never as so much dry exposition of certain melodic ideas. He threaded [illegible] the mazes of the finale, and yet in his pursuit of them he did not forget to make the entrance of the trombones the stirring beginning of a climax that rose steadily to the end. He read the symphony as music [illegible] has no other appeal than its own quality and its own processes; but he did not forget that in them are the emotions of thought imaginative, beautiful and ordered so. He kept Brahms continent and contained as he should be, but he nowhere made him austere. In particular he gained the rich instrumental coloring in which Brahms delighted—notably in the serener passages of the first movement and in the varied song of the andante. Here and there the music might have been more emphatic; once again the ear and the fancy missed a stroke that they expected; the rare eloquence with which now and then an exceptional conductor can lift Brahms to something close to majesty was indeed lacking. Mr. Wendling let the composer speak for himself, but kept him, so to say, speaking truly. And at the end of the concert he was no less sympathetic and understanding toward the very different music of the Berlioz of the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Like most of Berlioz's music it needs performance up to the hilt. In an ideal musical world an orchestra of Berliozes should perform it. As it is in this nearer and more material world, it is a long-standing tour de force of our orchestra. The men, no less than the conductor, seemed to come eagerly to it yesterday, and it "sounded" with all Berlioz's breadth of energy of voice, his amplitude and richness of instrumental coloring, his sharpness of dramatic accent, his abrupt intensities of [illegible] Equally the men and Mr. Wendling made it true and stirring Berlioz.

Between Brahms and Berlioz came Mr. Strube's two pieces for orchestra and viola, with Mr. Férir to play the solo part and the composer to conduct, with the man [illegible] loyally eager to do his will and catch the vein and voice of the music to the utmost as they had been with Mr. Wendling. One of the pieces, "Longing," a tone-poem in little, was played at the Symphony Concerts three years ago; the contrasting second, "A Fantastic Dance," came newly to performance yesterday. The suggestion and the background of both are poems by Mr. William Lyman Johnson—the one the voice of longing for the peace of night and solitude after the tumult of the day and the world; the other a picture of a mystic and purifying dance that clears and scatters the earth's accumulated sorrow by the whirl and passion of its own wildness. Mystical verse in spirit under all its rather rhetorical rush of words, and it is the spirit that Mr. Strube has caught and reflected in his music and given it a mystic withal that is of his own imagination kindled.

Throughout the two tone-poems—for they really are in little—are music of shadowy, remote, fitful and vaporous suggestion. It is the echo, now harsh and shivering, and now faint and far, of the turbulent day that makes the [illegible] background of "Longing." It is the clamorous echo of the wild dance rather than the din of it that runs through the second piece. And the voice of the [illegible] ing viola in the first is a gentle, brooding, musing voice, speaking in subtle intensities. In the dance, in turn, the viola speaks the secret of the [illegible] rite—the weariness of spirit, the [illegible] of the sorrow that the wild [illegible] lifting, the longing, again, for the [illegible] that is to come. The plaintive [illegible] the viola is a familiar thing, but the poignancy of its voice is an old one in instrumental expression. Mr. Strube found the suggestion of mystery also in its tones and made it [illegible] Imaginings. Yet he has kept the solo instrument; he has [illegible] sadness, and still [illegible]

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible] MD
MAR 1? 1908

WENDLING DOES WELL IN MUCK'S ABSENCE

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES SEASON'S LAST CONCERT.

Injury To Noted Conductor Robs Evening Of Much Of Its Pleasure. A Programme Of Novelties.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert of the season at the Lyric last night should have been Dr. Muck's farewell to Baltimore, but the great conductor was ill and unable to lead. The performance was ably directed by Herr Wendling, the concert-master.

During his two years in America Dr. Carl Muck has shown himself possessed of many professional virtues and one weakness. The first named are more than usually luxuriant in his case, and they partially blind the public to his cardinal fault. Dr. Muck's virtues are comprehensive knowledge of all which is vital in life (whether musical or otherwise), intuitive comprehension of tonal subtleties, a perfect sense of proportion in adjusting details or perspectives, absolute self-control and self-abnegation, magnetic control of those looking to him for direction and becoming modesty of demeanor while conducting. Dr. Muck's weakness is programme making. Boston, with her 20 yearly concerts, has been somewhat restive under his almost uninterrupted doses of novelties. We, with our five concerts, have had still greater cause for dissatisfaction. There have been some programmes during the two seasons which were so entirely experimental that they aroused a feeling of rebellion in the hearers. Excepting this misjudgment in making selections, Dr. Muck has proved himself a master of masters—quite worthy of association with Nikisch, Hans Richter, Gericke and Rothwell. These men all stand on a plane so high that the assertion of their physical ego, through superfluous motions while conducting, would be impossible.

Dr. Muck Earns Regards.

Mr. Gericke had endeared himself to the Baltimore public, and we all felt a painful wrench when he left us. Dr. Muck has not had so many years, nor the intimate intercourse, still his quiet, unostentatious masterfulness and refined gentility have earned the warm regard of all artistic natures. We shall miss him, however capable Max Fiedler may prove.

The following selections were presented last evening:

Concerto in F Major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras (edition of Gustav F. Kogel. First time in Baltimore) .....Haendel
- Pomposo.
- Allegro.
- A tempo ordinario.
- Largo.
- Allegro.

Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller (1770), Op. 100. (First time in Baltimore.)....
.....Reger

Caprice on Spanish Themes. Op. 34. (First time in Baltimore).....
.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
- Alborada.
- Variations.
- Alborada.
- Scene and Gipsy Song.
- Fandango of the Asturias.

Concerto Was Interesting.

The Haendel Concerto was interesting in its entirety and beautiful in spots. "Fatal facility," which today exerts a strong influence on some composers—at time crowding the imagination out of the creative field—was a power to be feared, even in the Eighteenth Century. Bach was less often a sufferer from this debilitating malady than was Haendel; indeed, in the great cantor's work facility is made more entirely subservient to conception than it is in that of any other master. This concerto contains episodes which fell from the point of the pen and then again fascinating moments. The virtuosity of the wood-wind in the performance of this work was simply marvelous. The distinguishing feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is that whatever instrument or group of instruments is made to assume prominence during a performance, one feels the virtuoso's touch, and there is no feature of this great organization which so distinguishes it from all others as the playing of its eight contrabassi. Nothing like the violin playing of these men upon their big instruments can be heard elsewhere.

Max Reger has been a bone of contention for the past six years. His adherents, of whom there are many, would have him accepted as the composer of his generation; but the mass of the world's musicians and musical connoisseurs has arrived at no verdict as to his status. Reger's audacity and contrapuntal skill are dazzling, but the schemes and methods are too unconventional to be readily convincing. These "Variations and Fugue" have been played everywhere in Europe, and they have never failed to arouse active controversy as to their merits. Reger is certainly not a modest flower, to fade and die unnoticed. He will, if permitted, occupy the centre of the stage. As these Variations had been so much discussed, there was some justification for their performance here, but it would have been more agreeable had the balance of the programme been familiar music.

Variations Give Fine Practice.

The Variation form affords students fine practice, for in it they are supposed to take a theme and use it as a lay figure upon which to drape all styles of work; endeavoring through this manipulation of externals to create contrasting phases. It is, however, a style of work better designed for the schoolroom than for the studio. Reger's redundant situations and moments of monotony in his variations are not, however, caused by his fealty to his theme, which is extremely shadowy. The work contains [illegible] on Wednesday taken as a whole, the Variations are too long and are full of finical devices which fail to justify their employment. The first section of the Fugue is an astounding piece of contrapuntal writing. Its flow and ease have not been equaled in late years.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice is unimportant as far as thematic material is concerned, but its diction is transparent and its instrumentation is beautiful.

Herr Wendling showed himself very resourceful, and the attitude of the orchestra toward him in his trying situation was delightful to see. The audience took pleasure in recognizing Herr Wendling's services. Dr. Muck's departure without a farewell is indeed sad.

O. B. B.

Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, is to play with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of next week, probably for her last appearances here before her departure to Europe for the long tour she purposes to make there next autumn. For the first time, moreover, in Boston, she wil undertake Schumann's concerto.

EVENING MAIL,
From .....
Address New York City.
Date MAR 23 1908

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 1908

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES FIND DEFENDERS

Today's Letters Give a New Turn to the Debate—Mme. Kalich Acts Her New Part in New York—A Pretty Theatrical Quarrel in Paris with the Academy, the Comedie-Francaise and the Government All Involved—Dr. Muck's Neuritis—Plays for the Hollis and the Colonial in May—Rudolf Ganz's Departure and Germaine Schnitzer's Return—Theatrical News of the Day

The Other Side Speaks

To the Editor of the Transcript:

We cannot hope to change the conservative attitude of your two correspondents of March 23, towards Dr. Muck's programme, but we trust their advice will not be followed. There are many conductors who are able to give us traditional interpretation of well-known music, but there are few who can reveal to us the new as well as glorify the old. While we have such a one let us appreciate the privilege, and make the most of it. The compositions of our own day may not be as universally enjoyable and inspiring as are the great works of the past which have "stood the test of time," but let us not refuse to put the work of our own day to a similar test, and let us be glad of an occasional opportunity to judge for ourselves as to its significance and worth without leaving it to future generations.

ANOTHER MUSIC LOVER

March 24.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

In re Dr. Muck's programmes, may it be permitted me to speak who would fain be numbered with the "younger set" but am constrained by the length of regular attendance, extending over nearly twenty years, at the Saturday evening concerts. I am, notwithstanding, delighted every time I note a "first time" upon a promised programme. Sibelius, Mahler, Strauss, Puccini, Jacques-Dalcroze, d'Indy, Elgar, Loeffler—are not the names and the more or less individualized schools and trends of thought they represent—are not the very nationalities that unconsciously to the hearer form a background to their music—are not their efforts to create something different in art, sufficient to whet a musical curiosity, to justify listening from the intellectual standpoint alone? All this apart from the question of individual appreciation. Granted an overwhelming majority in the audience of those whose pleasurable feelings are destroyed by consecutive fifths, unresolved sevenths, inexperienced progressions and all the stock damnanda, one could forego a personal delight in rich and strange orchestration, in strange and symbolic "atmospheres," in symbolic and fascinating rhythms. I had rather hear our Symphony Orchestra "tune up" than listen to most so-called "music" or not go at all.

But why draw this hard and fast line between the old and the new? My musical enjoyment is very keen when I hear good plain song. It is very high when I have the privilege of a Beethoven symphony. It is very eager while I listen to the "incantations" of Mélisande. Why may we not enjoy a "Catholic Revival" in music, and are not Dr. Muck's programmes good material ad propagandam fidem—a catholicity literally comprehensive, not arrogated as a title by one line of tradition?

CAMBRIDGE

March 24.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

As one of the nine out of ten people who are dissatisfied with the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, I wish to offer a suggestion. If we are to have again Bischoff's symphony or other similar works, would it not add mightily to the cheerfulness of the evening if the programme were to state "Probably last time in Boston?" I feel that my greatest limitation in attempting to understand the present situation lies in the fact that I have never met the one man in ten who enjoys the recent programmes. It is my belief that he is more rare than is commonly supposed, and is, indeed, no other than

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved by concord of sweet sounds."

ANOTHER SYMPHONY PATRON

March 25.

Hugo Wolf's tone-poem, "Penthesilea," will not be played, after all, at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. To add it to Brahms's fourth symphony, Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," and Mr. Strube's two pieces for viola and orchestra, made the programme too long. Therefore "Penthesilea" goes over to a later pair of concerts. Dr. Muck, meanwhile, has fully recovered from the nervous strain of the trip to other cities last week; but the neuritis persists in his right arm; and he must rest it at least a week before he can use it again in conducting.

Notable among the Saturday musical events was the final Boston Symphony concert. Those present did not know how close to a tragic finale was the concert of Thursday night. After the concert Dr. Muck was poisoned at an informal supper, most simple in nature. Three doctors worked over the eminent conductor all night, and although he did not direct the concert in Brooklyn, he was determined to pull together long enough to take his formal leave of the New York public in a programme which consisted entirely of classics. These were Haydn's Surprise symphony and Beethoven's Fourth symphony, between which the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" was given. A large audience was present.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Particular interest attaches to the last concerts to be given at Carnegie Hall this evening and Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They will mark the last appearances of Dr. Karl Muck, who has won many admirers here, but who is obliged to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera.

k, 1

DR. MUCK IS WELL AGAIN

Was Able To Conduct Symphony Concert In Gotham Last Night—Presented A Wreath.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was prevented by an injury to his right arm from conducting at the last Baltimore concert of the present season at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, was able to resume his baton at last night's concert in New York.

Dr. Muck presented the New Yorkers a programme of American music, including Converse's "Jeanne D'Arc" suite, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." He was given a wreath by admirers in the audience.

n .....
ress .....
e .....

* * *

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
New York City.
is .....

DR. MUCK had this to say in the Boston Post last week in regard to his successor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, who was a fellow student with him in Leipzig from 1878 to 1880:

"Of Mr. Fiedler's personality I can tell you little. When we were students together in Leipsic he was a quiet, reserved, very earnest, and ambitious worker. As you know, he was at that time very frail in appearance, and we feared that he would die of consumption. Though there were the most friendly relations between us all he had few intimates. He was always studying and was a prodigious pianist at that time. He rarely joined in our larks, and we saw little of him save in the class room, and occasionally, when he, a quiet observer, was present in the evening at some house.

"Neither he nor I conducted at the time. He is a self-made man in this respect as in others. It was later that he sprang into prominence in this capacity, by himself organizing and conducting a series of orchestral concerts in Hamburg. Since then his fame has spread with remarkable rapidity until there is now no conductor more well known in Europe. I know him to be a broad and most extensively educated musician, one well grounded in the classics, but a very ardent disciple of the modern school. Of his characteristics as a conductor I will tell you this—he is the right man for the position."

[179]

TRANSCRIPT, SA[illegible]
MARCH 28, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Wendling Conducts Capably and Interestingly, and the Orchestra [illegible] Him to the Utmost—Brahms and Berlioz to Begin and to End the Programme with Mr. Strube's Little Tone-Poems for Viola and Orchestra Between—The New "Fantastic Dance"

A ripple of applause welcomed Mr. Wendling when he appeared first yesterday afternoon to conduct, in Dr. Muck's absence, at the Symphony Concert. At the close of each movement of Brahms's symphony in E-minor, with which the programme began, it waxed heartier, and from a departing audience, it was unusually warm at the end of the whole concert. Experienced concert-master though he is, Mr. Wendling is almost new to conducting; Dr. Muck's neuritis first disabled him in Washington and Baltimore last week; all unexpectedly Mr. Wendling had then to take the orchestra and perform, modestly, but not less heroically, the feat of leading it through Reger's tortuous Variations and Rimsky-Korsakoff's exacting "Spanish Caprice" without rehearsals—and with effect. Here at least he had his share in the choice of the pieces to be performed and opportunity to rehearse the orchestra in them. The men—quick and shrewd judges of a conductor suddenly set over them—had answered to him in Baltimore and Washington and done all that they might to aid.

They were not less responsive and helpful yesterday, and the esprit du corps of the whole band was good to feel. Sometimes we listeners are prone to forget that the Symphony Orchestra is a living institution in its men as well as its conductor, and that at need they can bear their part in an emergency and bear it heartily and well. They made the path of Mr. Wendling as easy as they could, and, doing so, they were loyal to their work, the orchestra and themselves.

Moreover, the major piece on the programme—Brahms's symphony in E minor—happened to suit Mr. Wendling's traits admirably. Last autumn, when as a new violinist, he played Brahms's concerto, he showed both sympathy and aptitude for the composer's music, and yesterday his conducting of the symphony confirmed both. He read the music lucidly, but never as so much dry exposition of certain melodic ideas. He threaded clearly the mazes of the finale, and yet in his pursuit of them he did not forget to make the entrance of the trombones the stirring beginning of a climax that rose steadily to the end. He read the symphony as music that has no other appeal than its own quality and its own processes; but he did not forget that in them are the emotions of thought imaginative, beautiful and ordered soul. He kept Brahms continent and contained as he should be, but he nowhere made him austere. In particular he gained the daily instrumental coloring in which Brahms delighted—notably in the serener passages of the first movement and in the varied song of the andante. Here and there the music might have been more elastic; once again the ear and the fancy missed a stroke that they expected; the rare eloquence with which now and then an exceptional conductor can lift Brahms to something close to majesty was indeed lacking. Mr. Wendling let the composer speak for himself, but kept him, so to say, speaking truly. And at the end of the concert he was no less sympathetic and understanding toward the very different music of the Berlioz of the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Like most of Berlioz's music it needs performance up to the hilt. In an ideal musical world an orchestra of Berliozes should perform it. As it is in this nearer and more material world, it is a long-standing tour de force of our orchestra. The men, no less than the conductor, seemed to come eagerly to it yesterday, and it "sounded" with all Berlioz's breadth and energy of voice, his amplitude and richness of instrumental coloring, his sharpness of dramatic accent, his abrupt intensities of mood. Equally the men and Mr. Wendling made it true and stirring Berlioz.

Between Brahms and Berlioz came Mr. Strube's two pieces for orchestra and viola, with Mr. Férir to play the solo part and the composer to conduct, with the men as loyally eager to do his will and catch the vein and voice of the music to the utmost as they had been with Mr. Wendling. One of the pieces, "Longing," a tone-poem in little, was played at the Symphony Concerts three years ago; the contrasting second, "A Fantastic Dance," came newly to performance yesterday. The suggestion and the background of both are poems by Mr. William Lyman Johnson—the one the voice of longing for the peace of night and solitude after the tumult of the day and the world; the other a picture of a mystic and purifying dance that clears and scatters the earth's accumulated sorrow by the whirl and passion of its own wildness. Mystical verse in spirit under all its rather rhetorical rush of words, and it is also in spirit that Mr. Strube has caught and reflected in his music and given it a mystery withal that is of his own imagination kindled.

Throughout the two tone-poems—as they really are in little—are music of shadowy, remote, fitful and vaporous suggestion. It is the echo, now harsh and shivering, and now faint and far, of the turbulent day that makes the musical background of "Longing." It is the clamorous echo of the wild dance rather than the din of it that runs through the second piece. And the voice of the yearning viola in the first is a gentle, brooding, musing voice, speaking in subdued intensities. In the dance, in turn, the viola speaks the secret of the purifying rite—the weariness of spirit, the weight of the sorrow that the wild ceremony is lifting, the longing, again, for the peace that is to come. The plaintive [illegible] the viola is a familiar thing, but the poignancy of its voice is an old delight. Mr. Strube found the suggestion of mystery in its instrumental expression. He found the suggestion of mystery also in its tones and made it reflect imaginings. Yet he has kept the solo instrument; he has given it cadenza, and still held it [illegible]

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, MARCH [illegible], 1908.

SMART NEW GOWNS GRACE REHEARSAL OF SYMPHONY

Symphony Hall was crowded yesterday. It was the nineteenth rehearsal and the "full house" sign was put out early. A conspicuous feature of the audience was its gayety in attire, several hundred spring hats and smart new gowns being in evidence. Carl Wendling received a welcoming hand as he took Dr. Muck's place as temporary conductor.

Seen in the smart throng were Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis (Margaret Waterman), with Mrs. William York Peters, both very handsomely gowned in gray, Mrs. Peters wearing a hat with blue plumes; Mrs. Frederick Warren, in black silk and ermine furs; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Grace Edwards in a black and white tailored gown and large gray hat with blue osprey plumes; her sister, Miss Edwards, Mrs. Thacher Loring, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. W. S. Fitz, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, very pretty in correct black; Mrs. George Lewis, now out of mourning and wearing a dark gray and one of the latest hats—a large black affair with tulle and a white pompon, her daughter, Marian Lewis, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, in pale gray crepe de chine; Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Miss Fay, Miss Eleanor Cotton, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Dixey and their fetching daughter Rosamond, Miss Hellier, Mrs. Abby Linnell, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard and others.

Musical Tastes

It is said that very likely Dr. Muck will some day return to Boston to resume charge of the Symphony Orchestra. The rumor is particularly interesting in view of the current discussion of the program he has offered audiences here and in other cities. Some would have it that he has leaned too far toward the modern schools and that many of the announcements "For the first time" should have read "For the first and last time." Just exactly what proportion of the Symphony patrons this sentiment represents is hard to ascertain; it may be large and it may be small; but, anyhow, it is vigorous and independent. On the other hand, it comes into collision, as it invariably must, with an equally vigorous element that has a liking for novelty. Nor is this liking by any means trivial or decadent. It takes into consideration the fact that newness is but the first stage of history; that even the classical symphonies were once novelties; that forms are ever changing, and that what was not enjoyed yesterday may be enjoyed today.

One of the New York critics, speaking the other day of the performance of Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller," expressed the liberal tendencies in this way: "It has been remarked before on this page that such enterprise as Dr. Muck has shown, and as other conductors have shown, in making known here novelties of a like character is the kind of enterprise which must be unflaggingly persisted in if we are to avoid stagnation; better, it was said, the disclosure of repeated banalities, than the failure to uncover, through a drowsy complaisancy, even a minor masterpiece. Therefore it was well that Mr. Reger's piece should have been set before us."

The work in question everywhere proved one of the popular novelties of the season; and it was well to have it on the program. There are people who regard Reger as the greatest living composer. Probably they are extremists. But to exclude the Reger work would have been to put a premium on ignorance. Up to this week the season's programs are quite evenly balanced as regards old and new, classic and modern, pieces, and this would seem to be a happy proportion. While not forfeiting in the least his affection for the older masters, the true music lover may yet give hearing and encouragement to the composers of today. For without the opportunity thus afforded art could not exist.

Dr. Muck's arm is so slow in improving that under the advice of his physician he will not conduct the Symphony concerts of next week and Mr. Wendling will take his place once more. On this account the program as announced is to be changed. The correct program which Mr. Wendling will conduct for Friday afternoon, April 3, and Saturday evening, April 4, is as follows: Hugo Wolf, symphonic poem, "Penthesilea;" Liszt, concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1; Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 5, in E minor. The "Penthesilea" was originally put on this week's program, but Mr. Wendling decided to take it off, lest the concert be too long.

whole poetic scheme. With no less inventive resource and imaginative skill, he has made both pieces as truly symphonic in structure as though he were writing "absolute" music. He heeds form because he can make it serve his imaginative and expressive ends, without license and without defiance.

H. T. P.

HERALD—BOSTON, MARCH 29, 1908.

WENDLING CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Orchestral Piece by Gustav Strube with Mr. Ferir as Viola Soloist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms
Two symphonic poems for orchestra and viola solo, "Longing" and "Fantastic Dance".....Strube
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"....Berlioz

Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted. Dr. Muck's arm needs rest, and Mr. Wendling will conduct the public rehearsal and the concert of the orchestra this week.

Mr. Strube's symphonic poem "Longing" was produced at a Symphony concert about three years ago. The viola solo was then played by Mr. Ferir, who also played it beautifully last night. The "Fantastic Dance," heard last evening for the first time, was composed by Mr. Strube in 1906 as a companion piece. Verses by Mr. W. L. Johnson, the poet of "Longing," suggested the fantastical music to Mr. Strube, who endeavored, no doubt, to outvie the spirit of the poet's lines:

The whirling of this dance of earth,
Dislustered dance, and vague, importuned mirth,
'Gainst sorrow only can protest.

* * *

The sympathetic shriek of flaming continents,
The long, pale cry of quenched firmaments,
The wild, attritioned thoughts that in me clang and crash.

Whether Mr. Strube succeeded in being more fantastical than Mr. Johnson is after all a minor question. He certainly succeeded in producing an uncommon score as far as instrumentation is concerned. His use of instruments is masterly, and in this work he has found new combinations and contrasts of timbres, surprising and bizarre effects. In this respect Mr. Strube has indisputable talent; he has true orchestral imagination. Furthermore this dance in rondo form has inherent character without the aid of gorgeous or singular instrumental dress. Whether you like it or dislike it, there it is and it makes an impression.

It is not merely an experimental work, a study in the fantastical; it has well rounded form and substance; it has a logical flow of thought, a continuity that leads inevitably to the end. The piece is a brilliant one, and on the whole to be preferred to the earlier "Longing," which, although it contains passages of contemplative beauty and has mood, is nevertheless too discursive, and the sentiment is occasionally too near sentimentalism.

Mr. Ferir again gave pleasure by his wondrous tone, artistic phrasing and sympathetic interpretation. He and the composer, who conducted his pieces, were warmly applauded.

Brahms' symphony in E minor is the least impressive of the four. The austerity with which the composer has been reproached—in many instances unjustly—is here pronounced. The solidity of the structure may be admired, but the structure itself is granitic and unrelieved.

The symphony has not the epic grandeur of the first, the geniality of the second, the wealth of varied beauty that distinguishes the third, nor is there in the fourth anything that compares with the superb opening burst of its immediate predecessor.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" is now 70 years old at least, and it is still effective, brilliant, exciting. The years go by and music that was once applauded is now utterly forgotten, and music that was once mocked and hissed is now honored and even listed as classic—if that term be a compliment. There is constant readjustment of values. This composer is asked to sit lower and that one is placed nearer the Muse herself. Berlioz is surely among the immortals.

If the composers of the 19th century be calmly examined, without favor, without prejudice, there is no greater force, no more striking individual influence in orchestral music than Hector Berlioz. He created the modern orchestra. However daring the ultra-modern may be in his orchestral writing, he owes a heavy debt to the man that without academic training, by sheer creative genius, taught the orchestral way to posterity and is still today in the front rank.

Mr. Wendling conducted with much energy. He knew what he wanted, and he was as a rule successful in obtaining it. His task in view of the circumstances was not an easy one, and he acquitted himself manfully.

STAR—BOSTON.

Carl Wendling, concert master, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Boston on March 27 and 28, and will do so on April 3 and 4, for Dr. Muck's right arm is in such condition that he must give it a complete rest if he is to escape serious trouble. Last winter, when in Providence, in trying to open a carriage door, which stuck, he struck the back of his hand against the little button which holds down the curtain. It caused him some discomfort at the time, but he did not think very much of it, and did not take his physician's advice to rest his arm for a week. It seems that he had the misfortune to strike one of the long nerves that runs up the arm, with the result that for the past two or three weeks he has suffered much discomfort with it, and was able to conduct only a few of the

[illegible]

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1908

The Debate on the Programmes

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I have clung to a theory that none but the musically gifted had much right to opinions about the Symphony programmes, and that, although the rest of us might be bursting with comment we are "out of it," so to speak, through our own limitations. The talented and the taught are our lawful heads. We are the submerged tenth who inherit nothing and are trained to nothing. We are merely, in the most fruitless and irresponsible way, wakened to ecstatic tremors by sweet sounds the which we have no means of making for ourselves. Some of us cannot even sit down to a score, to read and remember.

But if they only guessed—the puissant They who reign over us—how we watch and listen a season through for a hint that the old, the immortally beautiful things are to be given—why, the very violins of the orchestra would jump out of their cases and begin playing to us before the concert begins! Dr. Muck himself could n't prevent it.

They tell us—again the Olympian They—that they have heard these things over and over, and they hint to us—at least by giving away their tickets on Beethoven nights—that they are tired of listening. But we are not tired! It seems not so long ago that we were sitting up nights over "Charles Auchester," and wondering, too, how a Beethoven symphony really sounded. We found out. It sounded like something as incredible and as certain as heaven, and like the world waking up in the spring. And we are not yet sated with spring nor the sunrise, though both come with regularity and, as some maintain, too often. Music is not a business with us. It is a means of being happy. And we humbly own that those to whom it is a serious occupation have their right to know what is doing in it all over the world and to hear when another Beethoven or a new Schumann is born; but we beg them to allow us turn and turn about. "Drink fair, Betsy!" If we go sweetly (if puzzled!) away, after "some new thing," let it be with the snug certainty that next night the table will be spread for us—it will be our programme.

ALICE BROWN

March 26.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I was glad to see the two letters defending the Symphony programmes in your issue of March 25, and should be glad to tell "Another Symphony Patron," who is one of the nine out of ten dissatisfied with them, that there are 500 people at every rehearsal who wait two hours, and often much longer, for the chance of hearing the new music, as well as the old, of which Dr. Muck is such a sympathetic interpreter. This patron, who has never been fortunate enough to meet the "one man in ten," might be interested to go on a "rush seat" some day.

CONSTANT ATTENDANT

March 27.

It has been remarked before on this page that such enterprise as Dr. Muck has shown, and as other conductors have shown, in making known here novelties of a like character is the kind of enterprise which must be unflaggingly persisted in if we are to avoid stagnation; better, it was said, the disclosure of repeated banalities, than the failure to uncover, through a drowsy complaisancy, even a minor masterpiece. Therefore it was well that Mr. Reger's piece should have been set before us. [Harper's Weekly.

Perhaps it will aid our correspondents in the debate which they have begun and are continuing interestingly and informingly, and make the subject matter of it clearer to our readers in general, to print herewith a list of the pieces that Dr. Muck has put thus far on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts this season, with that of today included. To meet the course of the debate we have divided them roughly into a classic and a modern group, and placed in the former the music of composers modern by date but of established place as accepted classics—or something less. A star marks in both groups the pieces played for the first time in Boston.

THE CLASSICS

Bach: Suite in D major; Toccata and Fugue for Organ.
Beethoven: Symphonies No. 6, No. 4, No. 2; "Leonore" Overture No. 1.
Berlioz: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie."
Brahms: Symphony, No. 2; No. 4; Concerto for Violin.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval."
Goetz: Symphony in F major.
Goldmark: Overture, "In the Spring."
Händel: Concerto for Wind Choirs and Strings.
Haydn: "Surprise" symphony.
Lalo: Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." "Spanish Symphony" for Violin.
Liszt: Concerto for Piano, No. 2.
Mendelssohn: "Scotch" Symphony.
Mozart: Symphony in G minor; in D major; *Three German Dances.
Rheinberger: Concerto for Organ.
Rubinstein: Concerto for Piano, No. 4.
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva;" Overture to "Manfred."
Wagner: Kaisermarsch."
In all, twenty-eight pieces.

THE MODERNS

D'Ambrosio: *Concerto for Violin.
Balakireff: *Symphony in C major.
Bischoff: *Symphony in E major.
Boehe: *Tone-Poem "Taormina."
Bossi: *"Intermezzi Goldoniani."
Bruckner: Symphony in D minor.
Chabrier: "España;" Overture to "Gwendoline."
Chadwick: Symphonic Sketches.
Chausson: *Tone-Poem, "Viviane."
Converse: "Jeanne d'Arc."
Dohnanyi: *Concert-Piece for 'Cello.
Franck: *Tone-Poem, "The Redemption."
Hinton: *Concerto for Piano.
Humperdinck: *Overture to "The Forced Marriage."
D'Indy: *"Wallenstein."
Loeffler: *"A Pagan Poem."
MacDowell: "Woodland" Suite; "Indian" Suite; Concerto for Piano, No. 2.
Pfitzner: *Overture to "The Little Christ-Elf."
Reger: *Variations and Fugue.
Resnicek: *Two Movements of "Symphonic Suite."
Rimsky-Korsakoff: *"Spanish Caprice."
Schilling: *Fantastic Suite.
Schjelderup: *Two Orchestral Pieces.
Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel."
Strube: Two Pieces—one *new—for Viola and Orchestra.
In all, twenty-eight pieces.

Clearly the balance is even—much evener than some of the disputants have believed.

[illegible] in Boston

Dr. Muck's neuritis still hampers him in the use of his right arm; rest for it, says his doctor, is the only cure; therefore he will not conduct for yet another week, and Mr. Wendling will take the concerts of Friday and Saturday, April 3 and 4. Accordingly, Paul Ertel's new piece, "The Midnight Review," described yesterday in this place, goes over to a subsequent pair of concerts.

POST, MARCH 29, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Temporarily Disabled—Mr. Wendling Conducts—Mr. Ferir Plays Compositions by Strube

A slight accident which occurred to Dr. Muck's arm some weeks ago was disregarded at the time, and the continual strain on that member in the course of many rehearsals has ultimately resulted in its temporary disablement. The conductor's place was taken by Mr. Wendling, the concert-meister, who had also conducted a number of the concerts during the last tour of the orchestra.

As a result of these conditions the programme that had been announced was altered, and the works given were these: Brahms' Symphony in E minor, No. 4; Two Symphonic Poems for viola and orchestra, "Longing" and "Fantastic Dance" (first time), after poems by W. L. Johnson of Boston, by Gustave Strube; Overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Mr. E. Ferir, the first viola player, interpreted the viola part in the performance of Mr. Strube's compositions. The men of the orchestra might truly be said to be responsible for this programme.

Mr. Strube's "Longing" was first given at a memorable concert in the spring of 1905, when Paderewski played the Chopin F minor concerto and Cesar Franck's symphony that towers so high among the greatest masterpieces of modern music was given an unforgettable performance. Since that time the composer has made some slight revisions in the score.

The impressions received at the first performance were renewed on this occasion. Mr. Strube writes with unusual clearness and distinction, with melodic charm, and he employs an atmospheric harmonic background. He is rarely felicitous in the treatment of the solo instrument, and the finely-wrought orchestration is an achievement of ingenuity and good taste. He has given us a beautiful nocturne, a poetic nucleus of the poem that inspired its creation.

The "Fantastic Dance" was composed in 1906. It was conceived as a companion piece to the "Longing" written a year previously. The poem that gave rise to this composition deals, we are told, "with an ancient, sacred rite of relieving the earth of its accumulated sorrow." There are lines that deserve quotation, if only to elucidate the motives of the music. The main motive might be said to consist in the first quotation that Mr. Strube makes:

"Whirl! wild, bewildering dance,
With crash and blur of dissonance."

Two moods are contrasted, the first following the lines:

"Oh, I am weary, weary; let me rest!" etc.

The second is thus described:

"No! No! I cannot rest. The dance, the dance—
Once more the drums and crashing dissonance,
The beat of drums, the cymbals' metal crash,
The sympathetic shriek of flaming continents,
The long, pale cry of quenched firmaments,
The wild, attritioned thoughts that in me clang and clash."

This is a terrible fellow! Mr. Strube's music is free and rhapsodical in content, if not in form. Though there is some finely dissonant harmony he has fortunately not seen fit to literally reproduce either the "sympathetic shriek of flaming continents," or the "long, pale cry of quenched firmaments." Neither has he endeavored to philosophize in a wild and attritioned manner. There is an introduction which is as an invocation, a summons to the spirit dance. There is resourceful and original handling of material. Again there is masterly scoring, orchestration that is at once clear and refined, brilliant and incisive, an orchestral idiom that stands by itself in these days of wonderful instrumentation, that is essentially and entirely Mr. Strube's own. The composer conducted the performances of his own compositions, which were warmly received.

Mr. Wendling conducted in a manner deserving of the highest praise. He displayed not only the solid musicianship that we might with reason expect of the man who gave such a thoughtful and sincere interpretative reading of the Brahms concerto earlier in the season, but he had his forces under good control, and he evidenced the most sensitive appreciation of the inmost characteristics of the two very different compositions which came under his baton. Mr. Wendling is no doubt a keen admirer of Brahms, and seldom has the E minor symphony been more strongly and sanely presented, with more just regard for its structural symmetry and the absolute, impersonal character of the music. Yet, it is not given to every conductor to turn from this noble and eternal work and give the glowing performance of Berlioz's striving overture that took place yesterday evening.

Mr. Wendling is at present expected to conduct the rehearsal and concert of next week. The programme will consist of Hugo Wolf's Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea"; Liszt's E flat piano concerto, and Tchaikowsky's Symphony in E minor, No. 5.

[180]

HARPER'S WEEKLY
NEW YORK
MAR 28 1908

Music and the Opera

A DELIVERANCE BY MR. REGER

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

THE more one hears of the new music that is being put forth by Germany the stronger grows one's conviction of the paucity of any genuine creative impulse in that country to-day, with a single commanding exception; and that exception is, of course, the phenomenal Richard Strauss. It is doubtless a little unreasonable to expect to be able to agree in this matter with the amiable lady who told Matthew Arnold that she liked to feel that esthetic excellence was "common and abundant." As the sagacious Arnold pointed out, it is not in the nature of esthetic excellence that it should be "common and abundant"; on the contrary, he observed, excellence dwells among rocks hardly accessible, and a man must almost wear his heart out before he can reach her. All of this is quite unanswerable; yet, so far as musical Germany is concerned, is not the situation rather singular? There are in France to-day at least three men who produce music that is both original and important; in Italy there are two whose individuality is marked; Russia has three music-makers whose artistic profiles are of salient character; contemporary England is, so far as we are concerned, a musical terra incognita, but in these despised United States there is at least one creative musician who is producing work of a commanding quality. Yet Germany—the Germany which yielded the royal line founded by Bach and continued by Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, and Wagner—can show us to-day, save for the productions of the unique Strauss, only such things as the "Taormina" of Mr. Boehe, upon which we commented in this place not many weeks ago, the pompous and futile symphony by Hermann Bischoff recently performed here under Dr. Muck, and the Variations and Fugue by the much-discussed Max Reger, made known a little later under the same brilliant auspices—which forms the particular text for these sombre reflections.

It has been remarked before on this page that such enterprise as Dr. Muck has shown, and as other conductors have shown in making known here novelties of a like character, is the kind of enterprise which must be unflaggingly persisted in if we are to avoid stagnation: better, it was said, the disclosure of repeated banalities, than the failure to uncover, through a drowsy complaisancy, even a minor masterpiece. Therefore it was well that Mr. Reger's piece should have been set before us.

Reger is regarded by many in Germany with sincere veneration. He is held to be not only a master of the architectonics of his art, but a creator of rich inventive powers, a radical in the matter of harmonic effect, a music-maker of pith and learning,—altogether a man of mark. Timid souls have gasped at his daring in the use of strange and unprecedented effects, and he has said to have stupefied the philistines and enraged the conservatives by his Olympian disregard of the rules of the game. And yet—and yet—we have listened with infinite respect and incorrigible patience to Mr. Reger's latest and (presumably) most justly representative composition, his Variations and Fugue on a theme by Hiller, opus 100,—the work played by Dr. Muck and the Boston virtuosi,—and we are obliged to confess a complete inability to perceive any reason for the breathless excitement which Mr. Reger's lucubrations are alleged to have caused in his native land. These Variations have for their theme a tune by Johann Adam Hiller, and that most dauntless and resourceful of annotators, Mr. Philip Hale, has identified this tune as one from "The Harvest Wreath" (Der Aerndtekranz), an operetta published in 1771. In itself, it is trivial and unimportant enough, but it has served well as a stalking-horse for Mr. Reger's technical ingenuity, which is truly extraordinary. The several variations which it has germinated are remarkable for their complexity and variety of structure, for the admirable and superbly confident skill with which they are carried through. They have, too, at moments, a certain impressiveness, a certain firmness and dignity of line, which make their effect. But of the originality, the harmonic ferocity, the ruthless and iconoclastic innovations which we had been led to expect from Mr. Reger there is not a trace. This music roars very gently indeed, and it is almost as innocent of new and pregnant ideas as, in its own day, was the music of the lamented Hiller. It is not devoid of something which approaches beauty of a conventional and wholly normal kind, and it is, as has been said, extremely ingenious—masterly, indeed—in facture. But that, alas, is not the end of the praise with which one had hoped to greet Mr. Reger's deliverance.

Dr. Karl Muck

THE ADMIRABLE CONDUCTOR WHOSE CONNECTION WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMES TO AN END THIS SEASON

JOURNAL—MONDAY, MARCH 30, 1908.

STRUBE AND FERIR REAP SYMPHONY HONORS

Viola Soloist Gives Delightful Rendering of First Violinst's Compostion, and Both Are Repeatedly Recalled.

As usual, there was a novelty at the Symphony concert Saturday night. This time it was a symphonic poem for orchestra and viola solo, by Gustav Strube, who has been one of the first violins in the orchestra since 1891. The piece, bearing the title of "Fantastic Dance," was suggested to Mr. Strube by some lines dealing "with an ancient, sacred rite of relieving the earth of its accumulated sorrow." The composition was enthusiastically received. Mr. Strube and Mr. Ferir, the viola player, were recalled again and again. Mr. Ferir also played the solo part in another symphonic poem by Mr. Strube, "Longing," which was first heard at the Symphony Hall three years ago.

Dr. Muck being still disabled by neuritis, Mr. Wendling led the orchestra through the Brahms symphony in E minor and the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Both numbers were brilliantly played. The orchestra never gives finer proof of its stability and artistry than on such occasions.

Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist at this week's concert. She will play the Liszt concerto in E flat major. There are few more delightful pianists than this young American. The orchestra, with Mr. Wendling again leading, will play Tschaikowsky's E minor symphony and Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem "Penthesilea."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From JOURNAL
Address

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholocity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg, shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gorricke came from the Viennn Opera house, with little or no concert experience.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor.

From COURANT.
HARTFORD, CONN
Address
1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Monday evening at Foot Guard Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, will give a choice program, the first number of which is Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral Symphony." This work was written just 100 years ago, and is reminiscent of the composer's life in the country. The third movement of the symphony, practically a scherzo, is descriptive music of the first order. The playing of a small band of village musicians is [illegible] thunder storm, a wonderfully free piece of tone painting. The work as a whole is one of the most delightful creations of Beethoven's genius. Heinrich Gebhard will play Liszt's "Second Concerto in [illegible] for piano and orchestra. [illegible] on sale at John

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From COURANT.
Address HARTFORD, CONN
MAR 27 1908

Boston Symphony Concert.

For several seasons the concert-going public has liberally patronized three entertainments by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while Hartford has been favored with many musical attractions, the only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Foot Guard Hall on Monday evening, April 6, will doubtless be the musical event of the year. Dr. Karl Muck will return to royal opera at Berlin May 1 and this will be his last appearance outside of Boston. Mr. Gebhardt, who will play a piano concerto (to be announced later) with the orchestra, is so well and favorably known that comment on his ability is unnecessary. The sale of seats is in progress at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

[181]

Boston Symphony.

Owing to the indisposition of [illegible] Carl Wendling [illegible] concert of the 18th symphony [illegible] and Gustav Strube, [illegible] of the orchestra, [illegible] fellow-players through his two symphonic poems. These were "Longing" and a companion piece, "A Fantastic Dance," which was played here for the first time. The poems are written for orchestra and viola solo, the latter bringing forward Mr E. Ferir as soloist. Brahm's fourth symphony opened the concerts and Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," completed the four selections.

Mr Wendling led the orchestra admirably through devious musical ways that were quite familiar to the men and Brahms and Berlioz each received adequate interpretation. The players had no difficulty in following Mr Wendling's desires and their responses to his baton were prompt and evidently in accordance with his ideas.

There is so much of somber hue in the trial coloring of the Brahms composition that it is rather difficult to avoid monotony in parts of the first and finale movements, but Mr Wendling succeeded well in steering clear of this pitfall and the orchestra gave a perfectly smooth performance. In the Berlioz overture there were even better results, the more brilliant and pompous nature of the work seeming to be more effective in its appeal to players as well as the audience.

Mr Strube in his two poems gives the viola prominence as a solo instrument, and Mr Ferir showed that it can be made quite effective in this somewhat infrequent position. "Longing" represents a peaceful night with fitful moments of disturbance, the composition running mainly in legato passages. The solo viola by its depth of tone carries out well the idea of theme and Mr Ferir played the music with fine, expressive significance.

The soloist in the newer poem, the dance, gave further evidence of artistic ability, for the wild, weird, discordant measures were of the most extravagant modern type, calling for dash and brilliancy in execution. All this was vividly set forth by the soloist, Mr Strube has handled his scheme skilfully, his instrumental juggling is sufficiently non-melodic and ear-piercing at times to suit the most ultra-modern musical enthusiast, and the performance under his baton was as stirring as one could reasonably desire. Composer and soloist were liberally applauded.

Dr Muck's arm is so slow in improving that under the advice of his physician he will not conduct the symphony concerts this week, and Mr Wendling will take his place once more. On this account the program is as follows: Hugo Wolf symphonic poem, "Penthesilea"; Liszt concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1; Tschaikowsky symphony No. 5, in E minor. Mme Olga Samaroff will be the soloist.

—The mild weather on Friday brought out a number of spring hats at the Symphony rehearsal, the very large straw ones being the style that seemed to be most popular with the young women. Miss Ethel Barrymore, who was present, wore a severe tailor gown of hydrangea blue cloth and a large hat of the same color, with touches of brown velvet. Mrs Francis Peabody Jr was in gray serge and a blue plumed hat; Miss Helen Prince, who was with her aunt, Mrs Philip Wheatland, wore silver gray serge and a toque of coral red straw; Mrs John S. Curtis, black and white shepherd's check, a black and white ostrich boa, and black hat with black plumes; Miss Elinor Quincy, champagne cloth and a plumed hat of the same tone; her sister, Mrs F. R. Nourse, wore black broadcloth and a red straw hat with white roses and foliage; Mrs Arthur Astor Carey, blue serge and a blue hat with blue malines; Miss Grace and Miss Annie Edwards; Mrs Robert A. Bolt, black voile and a black hat with touches of silver; her daughter, Miss Alice Bolt, wore gray broadcloth and a gray hat with pheasant plumes; Mrs Warren Weeks, violet broadcloth and a black-plumed hat; Mrs S. H. Wolcott, gray and black striped cheviot and a large hat of red straw with black and white wings; Mrs J. H. Parker, black cloth and an ecru straw hat with black paradise plumes; Mrs Thomas Thacher, Mrs George Cushing, Miss Emily Reed, Mrs W. Scott Fitz, Mrs H. S. Grew, Mrs William Y. Peters, Mrs Edwin U. Curtis; Mrs Charles G. Weld, violet cloth and a black-plumed hat; Miss Elizabeth Harrington, dark blue serge and a blue hat; Miss Dorothea Davenport, brown cloth and a large green hat; Miss Elisabeth Gray, dark blue cloth and a black-plumed hat; Mr and Mrs Richard C. Dixey and Miss Rosamond Dixey, Mr and Mrs Wallace Goodrich, Mr Frederick Converse, Mrs George Mumford, Mr Hamilton Perkins and his daughter, Mrs Charles P. Greenough 2d; Mrs George Lewis, silver gray cloth and a black hat with white feathers; Miss Julia Coolidge, black and white striped cloth and a blue toque with blue feathers; Mrs J. J. Storrow, gray voile and a long wrap of sable and ermine; Mrs H. H. Fay, Mrs R. D. Sears, Miss Rosamond and Miss Alice Fay, Miss Jessie Sherman, Mrs Edward N. Fenno; Miss Louise Hellier, tan broadcloth and a white hat with tan plumes; Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs Albert Harding and her daughter, Mrs W. DeFord Bigelow; Mrs Matthew Luce, Mrs N. Hugh Cotton and her daughter, Miss Lillian Cotton.

ss
GLOBE MARCH 29, 190

Music and the Opera

A DELIVERANCE BY MR. REGER

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

THE more one hears of the new music that is being put forth by Germany the stronger grows one's conviction of the paucity of any genuine creative impulse in that country to-day, with a single commanding exception; and that exception is, of course, the phenomenal Richard Strauss. It is doubtless a little unreasonable to expect to be able to agree in this matter with the amiable lady who told Matthew Arnold that she liked to feel that esthetic excellence was "common and abundant." As the sagacious Arnold pointed out, it is not in the nature of esthetic excellence that it should be "common and abundant"; on the contrary, he observed, excellence dwells among rocks hardly accessible, and a man must almost wear his heart out before he can reach her. All of this is quite unanswerable; yet, so far as musical Germany is concerned, is not the situation rather singular? There are in France to-day at least three men who produce music that is both original and important; in Italy there are two whose individuality is marked; Russia has three music-makers whose artistic profiles are of salient character; contemporary England is, so far as we are concerned, a musical terra incognita, but in these despised United States there is at least one creative musician who is producing work of a commanding quality. Yet Germany—the Germany which yielded the royal line founded by Bach and continued by Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, and Wagner—can show us to-day, save for the productions of the unique Strauss, only such things as the "Taormina" of Mr. Boehe, upon which we commented in this place not many weeks ago, the pompous and futile symphony by Hermann Bischoff recently performed here under Dr. Muck, and the Variations and Fugue by the much-discussed Max Reger, made known a little later under the same brilliant auspices—which forms the particular text for these sombre reflections.

It has been remarked before on this page that such enterprise as Dr. Muck has shown, and as other conductors have shown in making known here novelties of a like character, is the kind of enterprise which must be unflaggingly persisted in if we are to avoid stagnation: better, it was said, the disclosure of repeated banalities, than the failure to uncover, through a drowsy complaisancy, even a minor masterpiece. Therefore it was well that Mr. Reger's piece should have been set before us.

Reger is regarded by many in Germany with sincere veneration. He is held to be not only a master of the architectonics of his art, but a creator of rich inventive powers, a radical in the matter of harmonic effect, a music-maker of pith and learning,—altogether a man of mark. Timid souls have gasped at his daring in the use of strange and unprecedented effects, and he has said to have stupefied the philistines and enraged the conservatives by his Olympian disregard of the rules of the game. And yet—and yet—we have listened with infinite respect and incorrigible patience to Mr. Reger's latest and (presumably) most justly representative composition, his Variations and Fugue on a theme by Hiller, opus 100,—the work played by Dr. Muck and the Boston virtuosi,—and we are obliged to confess a complete inability to perceive any reason for the breathless excitement which Mr. Reger's lucubrations are alleged to have caused in his native land. These Variations have for their theme a tune by Johann Adam Hiller, and that most dauntless and resourceful of annotators, Mr. Philip Hale, has identified this tune as one from "The Harvest Wreath" (Der Aerndtekranz), an operetta published in 1771. In itself, it is trivial and unimportant enough, but it has served well as a stalking-horse for Mr. Reger's technical ingenuity, which is truly extraordinary. The several variations which it has germinated are remarkable for their complexity and variety of structure, for the admirable and superbly confident skill with which they are carried through. They have, too, at moments, a certain impressiveness, a certain firmness and dignity of line, which make their effect. But of the originality, the harmonic ferocity, the ruthless and iconoclastic innovations which we had been led to expect from Mr. Reger there is not a trace. This music roars very gently indeed, and it is almost as innocent of new and pregnant ideas as, in its own day, was the music of the lamented Hiller. It is not devoid of something which approaches beauty of a conventional and wholly normal kind, and it is, as has been said, extremely ingenious—masterly, indeed—in facture. But that, alas, is not the end of the praise with which one had hoped to greet Mr. Reger's deliverance.

JOURNAL—MONDAY, MARCH 30, 1908.

STRUBE AND FERIR REAP SYMPHONY HONORS

Viola Soloist Gives Delightful Rendering of First Violinst's Compostion, and Both Are Repeatedly Recalled.

As usual, there was a novelty at the Symphony concert Saturday night. This time it was a symphonic poem for orchestra and viola solo, by Gustav Strube, who has been one of the first violins in the orchestra since 1891. The piece, bearing the title of "Fantastic Dance," was suggested to Mr. Strube by some lines dealing "with an ancient, sacred rite of relieving the earth of its accumulated sorrow." The composition was enthusiastically received. Mr. Strube and Mr. Ferir, the viola player, were recalled again and again. Mr. Ferir also played the solo part in another symphonic poem by Mr. Strube, "Longing," which was first heard at the Symphony Hall three years ago.

Dr. Muck being still disabled by neuritis, Mr. Wendling led the orchestra through the Brahms symphony in E minor and the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Both numbers were brilliantly played. The orchestra never gives finer proof of its stability and artistry than on such occasions.

Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist at this week's concert. She will play the Liszt concerto in E flat major. There are few more delightful pianists than this young American. The orchestra, with Mr. Wendling again leading, will play Tschaikowsky's E minor symphony and Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem "Penthesilea."

Dr. Karl Muck

THE ADMIRABLE CONDUCTOR WHOSE CONNECTION WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMES TO AN END THIS SEASON

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ress .....

te .....

Max Findler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholocity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programs for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg, shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Goricke came from the Viennn Opera house, with little or no concert experience.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor.

From .....

Address .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Monday evening at Foot Guard Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, will give a choice program, the first number of which is Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral Symphony." This work was written just 100 years ago, and is reminiscent of the composer's life in the country. The third movement of the symphony, practically a scherzo, is descriptive music of the first order. The playing of a small band of village musicians is [illegible] thunder storm, a wonderfully free piece of tone painting. The work as a whole is one of the most delightful creations of Beethoven's genius. Heinrich Gebhard will play Liszt's "Second Concerto in A Major" for piano and orchestra. Reserved seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ress .....

e .....

Boston Symphony Concert.

For several seasons the concert-going public has liberally patronized three entertainments by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while Hartford has been favored with many musical attractions, the only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Foot Guard Hall on Monday evening, April 6, will doubtless be the musical event of the year. Dr. Karl Muck will return to royal opera at Berlin May 1 and this will be his last appearance outside of Boston. Mr. Gebhardt, who will play a piano concerto (to be announced later) with the orchestra, is so well and favorably known that comment on his ability is unnecessary. The sale of seats is in progress at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

[191]

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Owing to the indisposition of Dr Muck concert-master Carl Wending conducted two numbers of the 12th symphony programs, and Gustav Strube, another member of the orchestra, guided his fellow-players through his two symphonic poems. These were "Longing" and a companion piece, "A Fantastic Dance," which was played here for the first time. The poems are written for orchestra and viola solo, the latter bringing forward Mr E. Ferir as soloist. Brahm's fourth symphony opened the concerts and Berlioz' overture "Benvenuto Cellini," completed the four selections.

Mr Wendling led the orchestra admirably through devious musical ways that were quite familiar to the men and Brahms and Berlioz each received adequate interpretation. The players had no difficulty in following Mr Wendling's desires and their responses to his baton were prompt and evidently in accordance with his ideas.

There is so much of somber hue in the trial coloring of the Brahms composition that it is rather difficult to avoid monotony in parts of the first and finale movements, but Mr Wendling succeeded well in steering clear of this pitfall and the orchestra gave a perfectly smooth performance. In the Berlioz overture there were even better results, the more brilliant and pompous nature of the work seeming to be more effective in its appeal to players as well as the audience.

Mr Strube in his two poems gives the viola prominence as a solo instrument, and Mr Ferir showed that it can be made quite effective in this somewhat infrequent position. "Longing" represents a peaceful night with fitful moments of disturbance, the composition running mainly in legato passages. The solo viola by its depth of tone carries out well the idea of theme and Mr Ferir played the music with fine, expressive significance.

The soloist in the newer poem, the dance, gave further evidence of artistic ability; for the wild, weird, discordant measures were of the most extravagant modern type, calling for dash and brilliancy in execution. All this was vividly set forth by the soloist. Mr Strube has handled his scheme skilfully, his instrumental juggling is sufficiently non-melodic and ear-piercing at times to suit the most ultra-modern musical enthusiast, and the performance under his baton was as stirring as one could reasonably desire. Composer and soloist were liberally applauded.

Dr Muck's arm is so slow in improving that under the advice of his physician he will not conduct the symphony concerts this week, and Mr Wendling will take his place once more. On this account the program is as follows: Hugo Wolf symphonic poem, "Penthesilea"; Liszt concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1; Tschaikowsky symphony No. 5, in E minor. Mme Olga Samaroff will be the soloist.

—The mild weatner on Friday brought out a number of spring hats at the Symphony rehearsal, the very large straw ones being the style that seemed to be most popular with the young women. Miss Ethel Barrymore, who was present, wore a severe tailor gown of hydrangea blue cloth and a large hat of the same color, with touches of brown velvet. Mrs Francis Peabody Jr was in gray serge and a blue plumed hat; Miss Helen Prince, who was with her aunt, Mrs Philip Wheatland, wore silver gray serge and a toque of coral red straw; Mrs John S. Curtis, black and white shepherd's check, a black and white ostrich boa, and black hat with black plumes; Miss Elinor Quincy, champagne cloth and a plumed hat of the same tone; her sister, Mrs F. R. Nourse, wore black broadcloth and a red straw hat with white roses and foliage; Mrs Arthur Astor Carey, blue serge and a blue hat with blue maline; Miss Grace and Miss Annie Edwards; Mrs Robert A. Boit, black voile and a black hat with touches of silver; her daughter, Miss Alice Boit, wore gray broadcloth and a gray hat with pheasant plumes; Mrs Warren Weeks, violet broadcloth and a black-plumed hat; Mrs S. H. Wolcott, gray and black striped cheviot and a large hat of red straw with black and white wings; Mrs J. H. Parker, black cloth and an ecru straw hat with black paradise plumes; Mrs Thomas Thacher, Mrs George Cushing, Miss Emily Reed, Mrs W. Scott Fitz, Mrs H. S. Grew, Mrs William Y. Peters, Mrs Edwin U. Curtis; Mrs Charles G. Weld, violet cloth and a black-plumed hat; Miss Elizabeth Harrington, dark blue serge and a blue hat; Miss Dorothea Davenport, brown cloth and a large green hat; Miss Elizabeth Gray, dark blue cloth and a black-plumed hat; Mr and Mrs Richard C. Dixey and Miss Rosamond Dixey, Mr and Mrs Wallace Goodrich, Mr Frederick Converse, Mrs George Mumford, Mr Hamilton Perkins and his daughter, Mrs Charles P. Greenough 2d; Mrs George Lewis, silver gray cloth and a black hat with white feathers; Miss Julia Coolidge, black and white striped cloth and a blue toque with blue feathers; Mrs J. J. Storrow, gray voile and a long wrap of sable and ermine; Mrs H. H. Fay, Mrs R. D. Sears, Miss Rosamond and Miss Alice Fay, Miss Jessie Sherman, Mrs Edward N. Fenno; Miss Louise Hellier, tan broadcloth and a white hat with tan plumes; Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs Albert Harding and her daughter, Mrs W. DeFord Bigelow; Mrs Matthew Luce, Mrs N. Hugh Cotton and her daughter, Miss Lillian Cotton.

HALL'S REVIEW
NEW YORK CITY
APR 4 - 1908

Music and the Opera

AN "AMERICAN" CONCERT

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

DR. KARL MUCK did an amiable thing when he placed upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last New York appearances of the season three works by composers living in America. The occasion thus brought about was described in the preliminary announcements as "an American concert." It would be idle to quarrel with the designation on the score of the dubious Americanism of one of the composers represented, though it would as certainly be vain to regard the concert as in any important sense a demonstration of musical nationalism. Dr. Muck chose for performance a suite, "Jeanne d'Arc," by Mr. Frederick S. Converse, the "Pagan Poem" of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, and the "Indian" suite of MacDowell. Mr. Converse is indubitably an American; so, of course, was MacDowell; Mr. Loeffler was born at Mühlhausen, Alsace; he studied composition both in Germany and in France, and now lives in Medfield, Massachusetts; he has been a naturalized citizen of the United States for almost a quarter of a century. Mr. Converse in his music displays eclecticism; he writes at times like a Frenchman of to-day, at times like a German of the day that followed Wagner. What little there is of external influence in the musical personality of MacDowell suggests Scandinavia and the Germany of Wagner. As for Mr. Loeffler, he is in his music scarcely less French than the French, though there is a richer and stronger fibre in the substance of his thought than there would be if he were merely Gallic.—So again is one baffled in one's search for a unifying Americanism in the interesting exhibit arranged by Dr. Muck. One can fancy that excellent foreigner pondering the questions, "What constitutes an American? And what is American music?" Doubtless Mr. Converse is as American as may be, though it is a little difficult to trace any characteristic in his music which invites the exacerbating adjective. Doubtless, too, MacDowell was unimpeachably an American, and he wrote music that is saturated with individual flavor; but is there anything American in its mysticism, its bardic fervor, its poetic glamour? And coming again to the cosmopolitan Mr. Loeffler, is it possible to call his music American for any reason save that it was written within the bounds of Mr. Roosevelt's empire? So let us, in this matter, emulate the attitude assumed by Dr. Johnson upon a certain occasion. A lady had been discussing with the omniscient Doctor the question of a future state. "She seemed desirous of knowing more," relates the delectable Boswell, "but he left the question in obscurity." So, therefore, may we. It will be more profitable to consider briefly the actual quality of the musical exhibit so beguilingly displayed by Dr. Muck.

Mr. Converse's suite, which he describes as a series of "dramatic scenes," is a concert arrangement of the incidental music which the composer wrote for Mr. Percy Mackaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc," performed in New York last winter by Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern. It then shared the fate which in this country awaits all serious and ambitious music composed for use in connection with the spoken drama. That is to say, it had to suffer performance by an inadequate orchestra, and those portions of it which were designed to be played while the curtain was down were simply not listened to at all. In other words, Mr. Converse and the managers who commissioned his music were taught by melancholy experience the lesson which has so often been inculcated—that American playgoers are not prepared to listen to, and do not care to hear, serious incidental music in the theatre. To write and to perform it is a sheer waste of energy, time, and money.

Mr. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc" music is therefore, in its concert form, virtually a new thing. It is presented in five movements, bearing these titles: (1) "In Domrémy"; (2) "Pastoral Reverie"; (3) "Battle Hymn"; (4) "Night Vision"; (5) "The Maid of God." The music, completed—as to its present form—in 1907, is the latest that Mr. Converse has put forth. It cannot be said that it reflects credit upon its composer. We have before, and at some length, considered in this place the qualities which make Mr. Converse a conspicuous figure among composers living and writing in America. He has much skill, he has fervor, he has a sense of backgrounds and atmospheres, and he has poetic instinct. In his "Mystic Trumpeter," after Whitman, there are splendid moments, there are freedom and virility, a large and impressive sincerity. But one feels always with him that he is too hospitable to the casual idea, the inferior inspiration. His creative instinct is not fine enough, not scrupulous or suspicious enough. Thus it happens that his "Jeanne d'Arc" music, for example, has often the quality which Mr. Meredith had in mind when he characterized certain worthy sentiments as "platitudes under halos." Mr. Converse has obviously been moved and stirred by the noble and exalted implications of his subject; he has put down his meditations concerning them in music which is undoubtedly sincere, but which is grievously far from being eloquent or just. It is not telling in ideas, it is not marked or individual in its physiognomy, and it often verges upon something which, in a less responsible music-maker than Mr. Converse, would be called sheer commonness. One striking virtue it has: it is poetically and ingeniously scored, though it does not betray a particularly original method.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" is in a different case. It was inspired by a portion of the Eighth Eclogue of Virgil, and its burden is the longing of a Thessalian girl who, deserted by her lover, seeks by magic rites and incantations to lure him back to her. When Mr Loeffler's music was performed for the first time in Boston, on November 23 of last year, it was reviewed on this page, and a deliberate opinion of it was set down. It will therefore suffice to say now that the impressions recorded four months ago were confirmed by the first New York performance of this extraordinary work. We said then, and we say now, that in originality and imagination this tone-poem has not been surpassed by any piece of orchestral writing that has come out of America. It is music which, because of its path-breaking qualities, its utter freedom and independence of style, will be long in compelling any general recognition of its importance. This is music of to-morrow. Let there be noted here simply a conviction of its great beauty, its superb and victorious artistry, its engrossing eloquence.

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard

MR. GEBHARD PLAYED THE IMPORTANT AND DIFFICULT PIANO PART IN LOEFFLER'S "PAGAN POEM" AT ITS FIRST NEW YORK PERFORMANCE

Concerning the "Indian" suite of the lamented MacDowell, there is nothing to say that has not been said repeatedly by those who rightly value this noble and deeply affecting score. The suite is now sixteen years old, and it has been known to our concert rooms since 1896; yet its beauty and its nobility do not seem less potent and actual with the passage of time; rather does the music seem more deeply impressive, more certain of perpetuity, with the advancing years. And it will not be inapt to remark here that the music is most valuable in those portions of it which are of MacDowell's own invention. The themes of avowedly Indian origin upon which he founded the work give it an unquestionable pungency, a characteristic flavor; but the less sedulously aboriginal the composer is here the more memorable and consequential is the result. The themes which are of his own creation are, paradoxically enough, not only more musically seizing and potent, but more truly indicative of the essential mood, the fundamental intent, of the work. The fact is significant,—and, it may be ventured, worthy of consideration by those who hold a brief for aesthetic "nationalism."

It remains to be said that Dr. Muck, one of the greatest of living conductors, read each of these works with astonishing insight, with unflagging sympathy, with exquisite discrimination and notable authority: with the skill and clairvoyance of a master. The orchestra—an orchestra that for more than a quarter of a century has been an honor to art in America—played as it always plays: incomparably. It is certain that this remarkable body of virtuosi has never in its history played with so harmonious a blend of technical adroitness and expressional variety—it has never been at once so perfect and so eloquent an instrument.

JOURNAL APRIL 4, 1908.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

It is uncertain yet whether Dr. Muck will resume his work as conductor of the Symphony concerts next week. His arm has shown very considerable improvement, but he is under strict orders not to use it until it is quite well. At any rate, whether he or Mr. Wendling conducts, the twenty-first program will be as follows:

Overture to Figaro's Wedding.....Mozart
Symphony in E flat major, No. 2.....Ph. Em. Bach
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 3.....Henry K. Hadley

Mr. Hadley's new symphony, which is to be played, is looked forward to with much interest, for none of the younger American composers have made more rapid progress in their art than he. Last year the patrons of the Symphony concerts heard his symphonic poem, "Salome," which made a most favorable impression and showed a very considerable advance over anything he had done before that time. The new symphony in B minor which is to be played has been received with great favor in [illegible] and other German cities, where [illegible]

From Daily Times,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y
Date APR - 4 1908

Max Fiedler, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning unusual praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his programme among other things were the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler evidently does not share the prejudice of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audience of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. It is an interesting fact that the only music Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year, was the [illegible] symphonies in the full meaning of the word. If in this fifth symphony, Tschaikowski has departed somewhat from the strict letter of the symphony, it nevertheless remains a work of great individuality of sentiment, masterly technical treatment, and profoundly human emotion.

Mr. Wendling must gain the respect of his audience for the capable manner in which he again carried through a programme under conditions that well might prove harassing to many. He accompanied Madame Samaroff with precision and elasticity in a concerto that makes many demands upon the conductor. His interpretation of the symphony was distinguished by conspicuous breadth and temperamental warmth.

H. H.

[1 82]

THE SYMPHONY

Mr. Wendling conducted the [illegible] rehearsal in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as Dr. Muck is still in need of rest. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Poem "Penthesilea".....Hugo Wolf
Concerto No. 1 in E-flat.....Liszt
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.....Tschaikowsky

Mme. Olga Samaroff was the soloist.

The fame of Hugo Wolf undoubtedly will rest chiefly upon his marvellous fertility as a song writer, in spite of his opera, "Der Corregidor" and other works, for the list of his lyrics reaches the total of five hundred or more. No less an authority than Mr. Ernest Newman, who is not given to reckless or intemperate utterance, has pronounced him the greatest song composer in the history of music. Songs by Wolf have figured occasionally upon the programmes of Mme. Sembrich, Mr. Francis Rogers and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, while Mr. Bispham sang a long group of them at a recent recital. This ill-fated composer is also remembered by his "Italian Serenade," a work of charm and fancy, played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1905, and also in a version for string quartet by the Kneisel Quartet in the preceding year. The symphonic poem "Penthesilea," which appears to be his only published work for large orchestra, was given under Gericke in the autumn of 1904. It is hardly surprising that the history of this celebrated Amazon should have tempted Wolf. For in spite of its abnormal character, there is abundant opportunity for the delineation of vivid incident, the picturesque and sensuous contrast of the Feast of Roses, the wild conflict between warlike and human propensities precipitating a tragic conclusion. Moreover, Wolf was directly incited to the composition of "Penthesilea" by Hermann von Kleist's drama of the same name, which had affected the composer with unspeakable vividness. The music was composed when he was but twenty-three years old, although he worked at it many years later after his reason had given way. When the score was published in 1903, it was revised in some respects by Joseph Hellmesberger. As a whole this poem shows traces of immaturity and inexperience, although the first impression is one of surprise at the positive excellence of its descriptive verity. In spite of the vigor of the first section depicting the departure of the Amazons for Troy, there are traces of the tentative and the experimental; the fanfares illustrative of the march of the Amazons is somewhat conventional and verging upon crudity. With the episode treating of the Feast of Roses, comes a revelation of imagination, of emotional fancy that is far more convincing. While the sensuousness of this scene is somewhat restrained, it remains alluring to the fancy, and captivating by reason of its intrinsic musical beauty. If the section of conflict also seems somewhat tame in comparison with such more unforgettable combats as in Strauss's "Heldenleben," it must be remembered that Strauss had won his technical independence by a long list of orchestral works of progressive scopes in descriptive ambition, and that "Penthesilea" was virtually a first attempt seventeen years before, a long time in the ultra-rapid development of modern music. Furthermore the closing portions of the poems describing Penthesilea's death contain much of touching pathos and genuinely tragic simplicity. All in all, a remarkable if youthful work which interests not only by its native qualities, but on account of the promise which was destined to remain unfulfilled.

Liszt's E-flat concerto, long the subject of scurrilous criticism because forsooth a triangle was indicated in the score, has long been the virtuoso concerto par excellence. But its virtuosity is of an unusual order. It does not display its innate quality to the precise and composed technician, it cannot be played complacently or casually. It demands an audacious, unhesitating bravura, large rhetorical phrases, bold accents, and a careless contempt for its difficulties. Its octave cadenzas suggest the remorseless dash of the eagle upon its prey. Madame Samaroff is known in Boston as a pianist of uncommon fleetness of touch, of rippling and precise passage work, of clean-cut phrase in which the note of passion is conspicuously absent. Neither by temperament nor technical capacity is she the pianist for the first two sections of this concerto. The absolute domination of the piano was missing; she does not possess the brute strength, the fulness of tone, the heroic accent to do justice to the sentiment of the music. In the scherzo, however, her delicate tracery of passage work was all that could be desired and nothing could exceed the fascination of her shimmering virtuosity. If again in the opening octave cadenzas of the finale, the fiery bravura was again somewhat tempered, Mme. Samaroff carried all before her by the sheer velocity of the conclusion, a brilliant performance carried through with unfailing glitter and rhythmic incisiveness. It is surely no reproach that her singing phrases in the first portion and in the adagio were deficient in breadth of tone and rhetorical accent, for this is largely a matter of temperament, but the grace and verve of the scherzo and finale call for unusual and positive commendation. The audience in its enthusiasm recalled Mme. Samaroff again and again.

Tschaikovski's fifth symphony lacks something of that universality of appeal which threatens to make the "Pathetic" hackneyed and a by-word before its just time. But to the discriminating admirer of Tschaikovski it yields to [illegible] symphonies in charm and in [illegible] tion of his intimate individuality. The composer has been reproached for writing suites rather than symphonies, but he is surely not entitled to blame because the third movement is a [illegible] The departure from convention is a signal as Beethoven's replacing the time-honored minuet with a scherzo; moreover the way in which the theme of the introduction reappears in the [illegible] movement and finale is eminently symphonic. Furthermore the composers of other nations cannot be compelled to adhere strictly to the German notion of what constitutes a symphony. [illegible] not do this, neither [illegible] Saint-Saëns in [illegible]

NEW YORK
APR 4 1908

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 4,

Music and the Opera

AN "AMERICAN" CONCERT

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Dr. KARL K did an amiable thing when he placed upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last New York appearances of the season three works by composers living in America. The occasion thus brought about was described in the preliminary announcements as "an American concert." It would be idle to quarrel with the designation on the score of the dubious Americanism of one of the compositions represented, though it would as certainly be idle to regard the programme as making any important sense a demonstration of musical nationalism. Dr. Muck chose for performance a suite, "Jeanne d'Arc," by Mr. Frederick S. Converse, the "Pagan Poem" of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, and the "Indian" suite of MacDowell. Mr. Converse is indubitably an American; so, of course, was MacDowell; Mr. Loeffler was born at Mühlhausen, Alsace; he studied composition both in Germany and in France, and now lives on Medfield, Massachusetts; he has been a naturalized citizen of the United States for almost a quarter of a century. Mr. Converse in his music displays eclecticism: he writes at times like a Frenchman of to-day, at times like a German of the day that followed Wagner. What little there is of external influence in the musical personality of MacDowell suggests Scandinavia and the Germany of Wagner. As for Mr. Loeffler, he is in his music scarcely less French than the French, though there is a richer and stronger fibre in the substance of his thought than there would be if he were merely Gallic.—So again is one baffled in one's search for anything Americanism in the interesting exhibit arranged by Dr. Muck. One can fancy that excellent foreigner pondering the questions, "What constitutes an American? And what is American music?" Doubtless Mr. Converse is as American as may be, though it is a little difficult to trace any characteristic in his music which invites the discriminating adjective. Doubtless, too, MacDowell was unmistakably an American, and he wrote music that is saturated with individual flavor; but is there anything American in its mysticism, its bardic fervor, its poetic glamour? And coming again to the cosmopolitan Mr. Loeffler, is it possible to call his music American for any reason save that it was written within the bounds of Mr. Roosevelt's empire? So let us, in this matter, emulate the attitude assumed by Dr. Johnson upon a certain occasion. A lady had been discussing with the omniscient Doctor the question of a future state. "She seemed desirous of knowing," relates the delectable Boswell, "but he left the question in obscurity. So shall we." It will be more profitable to consider briefly the actual quality of the musical exhibit so bewitchingly displayed by Dr. Muck.

Mr. Converse's suite, which he describes as a series of "dramatic scenes," is a concert arrangement of the incidental music which the composer wrote for Mr. Percy Mackaye's play, "Jeanne d'Arc," performed in New York last winter by Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern. It then shared the fate which in this country awaits all serious and ambitious music composed for use in connection with the spoken drama. That is to say, it had to suffer performance by an inadequate orchestra, and those portions of it which were designed to be played while the curtain was down were simply not listened to at all. In other words, Mr. Converse and the managers who commissioned his music were taught by melancholy experience the lesson which has so often been inculcated—that American playgoers are not prepared to listen to, and do not care to hear, serious incidental music in the theatre. To write and to perform it is a sheer waste of energy, time, and money.

Mr. Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc" music is therefore, in its concert form, virtually a new thing. It is presented in five movements, bearing these titles: (1) "In Domrémy"; (2) "Pastoral Reverie"; (3) "Battle Hymn"; (4) "Night Vision"; (5) "The Maid of God." The music, completed—as to its present form—in 1907, is the latest that Mr. Converse has put forth. It cannot be said that it reflects credit upon its composer. We have before, and at some length, considered in this place the qualities which make Mr. Converse a conspicuous figure among composers living and writing in America. He has much skill, he has fervor, he has a sense of backgrounds and atmospheres, and he has poetic instinct. In his "Mystic Trumpeter," after Whitman, there are splendid moments, there are freedom and virility, a large and impressive sincerity. But one feels always with him that he is too hospitable to the casual idea, the inferior inspiration. His creative instinct is not fine enough, not scrupulous or suspicious enough. Thus it happens that his "Jeanne d'Arc" music, for example, has often the quality which Mr. Meredith had in mind when he characterized certain worthy sentiments as "platitudes under halos." Mr. Converse has obviously been moved and stirred by the noble and exalted implications of his subject; he has put down his meditations concerning them in music which is undoubtedly sincere, but which is grievously far from being eloquent or just. It is not telling in ideas, it is not marked or individual in its physiognomy, and it often verges upon something which, in a less responsible music-maker than Mr. Converse, would be called sheer commonness. One striking virtue it has: it is poetically and ingeniously scored, though it does not betray a particularly original method.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" is in a different case. It was inspired by a portion of the Eighth Eclogue of Virgil, and its burden is the longing of a Thessalian girl who, deserted by her lover, seeks by magic rites and incantations to lure him back to her. When Mr Loeffler's music was performed for the first time in Boston, on November 23 of last year, it was reviewed on this page, and a deliberate opinion of it was set down. It will therefore suffice to say now that the impressions recorded four months ago were confirmed by the first New York performance of this extraordinary work. We said then, and we say now, that in originality and imagination this tone-poem has not been surpassed by any piece of orchestral writing that has come out of America. It is music which, because of its path-breaking qualities, its utter freedom and independence of style, will be long in compelling any general recognition of its importance. This is music of to-morrow. Let there be noted here simply a conviction of its great beauty, its superb and victorious artistry, its engrossing eloquence.

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard

MR. GEBHARD PLAYED THE IMPORTANT AND DIFFICULT PIANO PART IN LOEFFLER'S "PAGAN POEM" AT ITS FIRST NEW YORK PERFORMANCE

Concerning the "Indian" suite of the lamented MacDowell, there is nothing to say that has not been said repeatedly by those who rightly value this noble and deeply affecting score. The suite is now sixteen years old, and it has been known to our concert rooms since 1896; yet its beauty and its nobility do not seem less potent and actual with the passage of time; rather does the music seem more deeply impressive, more certain of perpetuity, with the advancing years. And it will not be inapt to remark here that the music is most valuable in those portions of it which are of MacDowell's own invention. The themes of avowedly Indian origin upon which he founded the work give it an unquestionable pungency, a characteristic flavor; but the less sedulously aboriginal the composer is here the more memorable and consequential is the result. The themes which are of his own creation are, paradoxically enough, not only more musically seizing and potent, but more truly indicative of the essential mood, the fundamental intent, of the work. The fact is significant,—and, it may be ventured, worthy of consideration by those who hold a brief for aesthetic "nationalism."

It remains to be said that Dr. Muck, one of the greatest of living conductors, read each of these works with astonishing insight, with unflagging sympathy, with exquisite discrimination and notable authority: with the skill and clairvoyance of a master. The orchestra—an orchestra that for more than a quarter of a century has been an honor to art in America—played as it always plays: incomparably. It is certain that this remarkable body of virtuosi has never in its history played with so harmonious a blend of technical adroitness and expressional variety—it has never been at once so perfect and so eloquent an instrument.

THE SYMPHONY

Mr. Wendling conducted the twentieth rehearsal in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as Dr. Muck is still in need of rest. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Poem "Penthesilea".....Hugo Wolf
Concerto No. 1 in E-flat.....Liszt
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.....Tschaikowsky

Mme. Olga Samaroff was the soloist.

The fame of Hugo Wolf undoubtedly will rest chiefly upon his marvellous fertility as a song writer, in spite of his opera, "Der Corregidor" and other works, for the list of his lyrics reaches the total of five hundred or more. No less an authority than Mr. Ernest Newman, who is not given to reckless or intemperate utterance, has pronounced him the greatest song composer in the history of music. Songs by Wolf have figured occasionally upon the programmes of Mme. Sembrich, Mr. Francis Rogers and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, while Mr. Bispham sang a long group of them at a recent recital. This ill-fated composer is also remembered by his "Italian Serenade," a work of charm and fancy, played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1905, and also in a version for string quartet by the Kneisel Quartet in the preceding year. The symphonic poem "Penthesilea," which appears to be his only published work for large orchestra, was given under Gericke in the autumn of 1904. It is hardly surprising that the history of this celebrated Amazon should have tempted Wolf. For in spite of its abnormal character, there is abundant opportunity for the delineation of vivid incident, the picturesque and sensuous contrast of the Feast of Roses, the wild conflict between warlike and human propensities precipitating a tragic conclusion. Moreover, Wolf was directly incited to the composition of "Penthesilea" by Hermann von Kleist's drama of the same name, which had affected the composer with unspeakable vividness. The music was composed when he was but twenty-three years old, although he worked at it many years later after his reason had given way. When the score was published in 1903, it was revised in some respects by Joseph Hellmesberger. As a whole this poem shows traces of immaturity and inexperience, although the first impression is one of surprise at the positive excellence of its descriptive verity. In spite of the vigor of the first section depicting the departure of the Amazons for Troy, there are traces of the tentative and the experimental; the fanfares illustrative of the march of the Amazons is somewhat conventional and verging upon crudity. With the episode treating of the Feast of Roses, comes a revelation of imagination, of emotional fancy that is far more convincing. While the sensuousness of this scene is somewhat restrained, it remains alluring to the fancy, and captivating by reason of its intrinsic musical beauty. If the section of conflict also seems somewhat tame in comparison with such more unforgettable combats as in Strauss's "Heldenleben," it must be remembered that Strauss had won his technical independence by a long list of orchestral works of progressive scopes in descriptive ambition, and that "Penthesilea" was virtually a first attempt seventeen years before, a long time in the ultra-rapid development of modern music. Furthermore the closing portions of the poems describing Penthesilea's death contain much of touching pathos and genuinely tragic simplicity. All in all, a remarkable if youthful work which interests not only by its native qualities, but on account of the promise which was destined to remain unfulfilled.

Liszt's E-flat concerto, long the subject of scurrilous criticism because forsooth a triangle was indicated in the score, has long been the virtuoso concerto par excellence. But its virtuosity is of an unusual order. It does not display its innate quality to the precise and composed technician, it cannot be played complacently or casually. It demands an audacious, unhesitating bravura, large rhetorical phrases, bold accents, and a careless contempt for its difficulties. Its octave cadenzas suggest the remorseless dash of the eagle upon its prey. Madame Samaroff is known in Boston as a pianist of uncommon fleetness of touch, of rippling and precise passage work, of clean-cut phrase in which the note of passion is conspicuously absent. Neither by temperament nor technical capacity is she the pianist for the first two sections of this concerto. The absolute domination of the piano was missing; she does not possess the brute strength, the fulness of tone, the heroic accent to do justice to the sentiment of the music. In the scherzo, however, her delicate tracery of passage work was all that could be desired, and nothing could exceed the fascination of her shimmering virtuosity. If again in the opening octave cadenzas of the finale, the fiery bravura was again somewhat tempered, Mme. Samaroff carried all before her by the sheer velocity of the conclusion, a brilliant performance carried through with unfailing glitter and rhythmic incisiveness. It is surely no reproach that her singing phrases in the first portion and in the adagio were deficient in breadth of tone and rhetorical accent, for this is largely a matter of temperament, but the grace and verve of scherzo and finale call for unusual and positive commendation. The audience in its enthusiasm recalled Mme. Samaroff again and again.

Tschaikovski's fifth symphony lacks something of that universality of appeal which threatens to make the "Pathetic" hackneyed and a by-word before its just time. But to the discriminating admirer of Tschaikovski it yields to none of his symphonies in charm and in the revelation of his intimate individuality. The composer has been reproached for writing suites rather than symphonies, but he is surely not entitled to blame because the third movement is a waltz. The departure from convention is not so signal as Beethoven's replacing of the time-honored minuet with a scherzo, and moreover the way in which the theme of the introduction reappears in the slow movement and finale is eminently symphonic. Furthermore the composers of other nations cannot be compelled to adhere strictly to the German notion as to what constitutes a symphony. Liszt did not do this, neither did César Franck nor Saint-Saëns in his symphony in C minor, nor Vincent d'Indy in his instrumental masterpiece, the second symphony in B flat. Yet these works

JOURNAL, APRIL 4, 1908.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

It is uncertain yet whether Dr. Muck will resume his work as conductor of the Symphony concerts next week. His arm has shown very considerable improvement, but he is under strict orders not to use it until it is quite well. At any rate, whether he or Mr. Wendling conducts, the twenty-first program will be as follows:

Overture to Figaro's Wedding.....Mozart
Symphony in E flat major, No. 2..Ph. Em. Bach
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 3.....Henry K. Hadley

Mr. Hadley's new symphony, which is to be played, is looked forward to with much interest, for none of the younger American composers have made more rapid progress in their art than he. Last year the patrons of the Symphony concerts heard his symphonic poem, "Salome," which made a most favorable impression and showed a very considerable advance over anything he had done before that time. The new symphony in B minor which is to be played has been received with great favor in Berlin and other German cities, where it has been performed under the direction of the composer.

From Daily Times,
Address [illegible] N. Y.
Date APR - 4 1908

Max Fiedler, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning unusual praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his programme among other things were the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler evidently does not share the prejudice of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audience of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. It is an interesting fact that the only music Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year, was the "Kaisermarsch."

symphonies in the full meaning of the word. If in this fifth symphony, Tschaikovski has departed somewhat from the strict letter of the symphony, it nevertheless remains a work of great individuality of sentiment, masterly technical treatment, and profoundly human emotion.

Mr. Wendling must gain the respect of his audience for the capable manner in which he again carried through a programme under conditions that well might prove harassing to many. He accompanied Madame Samaroff with precision and elasticity in a concerto that makes many demands upon the conductor. His interpretation of the symphony was distinguished by conspicuous breadth and temperamental warmth.

E. B. H.

[182]

APRIL 5 1908

Soloist

at the Symphony Concert.

Dr. Muck being ill with neuritis and unable to use his conducting arm, last night's symphony concert was conducted by Herr Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra. Herr Wendling conducted splendidly, making somewhat hard work of it for himself, and at times apparently lifting the whole weight of the orchestra by his right arm. The players were with him all the way, and a person with poor eyesight would have been troubled to say whether Wendling or Muck held the baton.

The program began with Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," which is based on the tragedy of the same name by Heinrich von Kleist; then came the Liszt concerto in E flat major, with Mme Olga Samaroff at the piano, and finally the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 5—a program impossible of different arrangement, yet having a curious effect in its sequence of a let-down from a great tension, and then a taking up of a tremendous emotional burden again. One was tired at the end; also the pianist suffered by the program arrangement, for one forgot her marvelous performance in the upheavals around it.

But Mme Samaroff's performance was no less than marvelous. She is exceedingly good to see at a piano; those long, wonderfully pliant hands that float or flicker over the keyboard; the modest yet confident reading of a childish, ungrateful composition, the lightning of her attack and the superb technic, all make her most pleasing to the appreciator of piano playing. Without the strength for the topmost hights of fortissimo, without the weight and crash of the masculine player—and at times almost drowned by an enthusiastic wind section—she made the concerto almost intelligible, and played the "motto theme" like a dancing will-o'-the-wisp.

The savage, terrible music of Hugo Wolf's setting to Kleist's tragedy, which opened the concert, has been played here before, the first time being in 1904. It was written shortly before Wolf was confined in a madhouse, and indeed when he was discharged for the last time Wolf himself, supposed to be cured, said: "It's a pity I ever wrote such trash." Nevertheless, and notwithstanding that at its first rehearsal in 1904 the orchestra laughed, there was no laughing at it as trash last night. It was a reading as fiery as Wolf's own imagination could have demanded, and was as moving emotionally as it was interesting. It is not a thing that will be played often.

The Tschaikowsky symphony most closely adheres of all his works to symphonic form. Yet, after hearing two performances of it, the composer regarded it as a failure. Certainly, as played last night, it did not take the hearer to the hights reached by the "Pathetic" symphony. It is dramatic, it is the movement of great qualities in contention, and it is tragic, even in the magnificent crimson of its finale. But the very thematic repetition which makes it a wonder of construction robs it of the chiefest characteristics of Tschaikowsky. The repeated climaxes of the first movement thrash emotion until it can bear no more.

The symphony was beautifully played; the ensembles were clear and the tempi where demanded flexible and wilful as the composer himself could have asked.

It is uncertain yet whether Dr Muck will resume his work as conductor of the Symphony concerts this week. At any rate, whether he or Mr Wendling conducts, the 21st program will be as follows: Overture to "Firgaro's Wedding," Mazort; symphony in E-flat major, No. 2, Ph Em Bach; overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; symphony No. 3, [illegible] Hadley.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address

Date APR 5- 1908

The Boston Post published the following interesting little interview with Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony orchestra, regarding his successor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg:

"Dr. Muck, a fellow-student with Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of next season in Leipsig during the years of 1878-80, spoke interestingly of his recollections of the man concerning whom there is so much curiosity.

"'Of Mr. Fiedler's personality,' said he, 'I can tell you little. When we were students together in Leipsig he was a quiet, reserved, very earnest and ambitious worker. As you know, he was at that time very frail in appearance, and we feared that he would die of consumption. Though there were the most friendly relations between us all, he had few intimates. He was always studying and was a prodigious pianist at that time. He rarely joined our larks, and we saw little of him save in the classroom, and occasionally when he, a quiet observer, was present in the evening at some house.

"'Neither he nor I conducted at the time. He is a self-made man in this respect as in others. It was later that he sprang into prominence in this capacity by himself, organizing and conducting a series of orchestral concerts in Hamburg. Since then his fame has spread with remarkable rapidity, until there is now no conductor more well known in Europe. I know him to be a broad and most extensively educated musician, one well grounded in the classics, but a very ardent disciple of the modern school. Of his character as a conductor I will tell you this—he is the right man for the position.'"

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Wendling Again Conducts—Mme Samaroff Gives Brilliant Performance of Liszt's Concerto

Dr. Muck is as yet unable to use his arm, and Mr. Wendling was again called upon to conduct the 20th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra, the programme consisting of Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," Liszt's E flat piano concerto, and Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony. Mme. Olga Samaroff was soloist.

The "Penthesilea," when given for the first time at these concerts in 1904, disappointed many of the admirers of Wolf. It may be said at once that the composition falls short in more than a single instance, that it frequently fails to reach the dramatic heights of the poem which gave rise to its being.

It should also be remarked that there are few works by modern composers more truly indicative of a rich creative faculty, more painfully alive with only partially uttered thoughts of impressive daring and originality.

Wolf, whose enthusiasm amounted to madness, was a frenetic admirer of Heinrich von Kleist, after whose tragedy the work heard yesterday is modelled. This composition was written at a white heat by a youth and a genius of 23, a composer of fertile invention and towering imagination, fired with overpowering emotions of the intensely human drama of the woman who in perverse rage slew the object of her passion. Wolf had not at the time reached the zenith of his creative powers, nor was his technical mastery sufficient to cope with the task he had set himself. Indeed, it is a question whether his obsession—no lesser term would be sufficient—with his subject did not prove in some degree a stumbling block. Would not Berlioz's "Les Troyens," a gigantic inspiration, have been an achievement of more sustained strength if the composer had been capable of taking himself and his subject more calmly?

The opening pages of "Penthesilea" are vivid and effective. The amorous middle passage, or the passage which should be amorous—that suggested by the "Dream of the Feast of Roses"—is far less striking; but it is in the final section that one becomes most aware of a passionate voice choking for utterance, of a desire for expression so overmastering as to be partly defeated by its own vehemence and the tormenting consciousness of impotence to completely convey striving thoughts that must out. We are told that Wolf, dissatisfied with the latter portions of his work, rewrote them while in the Svetlin Asylum, in 1897, but that he later, in disgust, destroyed the new version.

Tschaikowsky, as he proceeded from his first to his sixth symphony, diverged further and further from the classical conception of the form. He became the more human and the less abstract as a musician. This fifth symphony, though conceived from a very personal standpoint, speaks of a theme that makes the whole world kin. No doubt as Beethoven, in his fifth—and one involuntarily makes comparisons that are disadvantageous to the work of the Russian—Tchaikowsky would also speak of fate, which knocks at the door, as he had previously done, in more pessimistic vein, in the fourth symphony.

In us all there is a fear which pursues and dogs our heels, a dweller on the threshold who must be conquered at every turn. So, with his darkly colored, fateful theme, whose inexorable presence persistently manifests itself in the restless, world-weary opening moment, in a romance that is all love-making and moonshine, that clouds the last measures of a doleful waltz, but finally emerges as a chant of triumph in the measures of as optimistic music as Tchaikowsky ever penned, does the composer speak, in tones that are naively frank and poignantly human, of the struggle through which all must pass.

So much for the motive of the symphony. How will it stand as a work of art? As a unit whose grand emotional content is eternally preserved by a structure the beauty and perfection of which will stay forever and appeal to each succeeding generation?

Since Mme. Samaroff first played the Liszt concerto in this city in 1906 she has materially strengthened her grip upon the piece. Her performance yesterday was very clean in execution and rhythm—in the latter respect it was almost overaccentuated—and her handling of the concerto was more authoritative than formerly. The self-control that this young artist manifests is always a matter of astonishment and admiration. In spite of the exhilarating speed at which the finale was taken there was always the feeling of reserve strength, and the pace was never such that a note was dropped or a theme entered unprepared. There was also a more sensuous quality of tone in the adagio, and the recitative passages in that movement were declaimed in a highly dramatic manner. Mme. Samaroff was repeatedly recalled.

Mr. Wendling we have to thank for a reading of Wolf's symphonic poem which said all that could be said for that composer, and for a very eloquent, if not entirely characteristic interpretation of Tschaikowsky's symphony.

The programme of next week will be as follows: Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," Mozart; symphony in E flat major, No. 2, Philip Emmanuel Bach; overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; symphony No. 3 (first time), Henry K. Hadley. Mr. Hadley's symphony is looked forward to with much interest, for he is one of the most promising and rapidly rising young American composers of today. The symphony, which is in the key of B minor, has been received with favor in Berlin and other German cities, where it has been performed under the direction of the composer.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Wolf—"Penthesilia." Symphonic poem.
Liszt—Piano concerto in E flat.
Pianist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 5, E minor.

Mr. Wendling conducted once more since Dr. Muck's arm is not yet well. Mr. Wendling is not as yet a graceful conductor, but he understands his score, he knows what he wants and he generally attains it. He has conducted but little heretofore and his virile readings augur well for his future in this field.

Poor Hugo Wolf! When one thinks upon his miserable life and many misfortunes one is apt to over-praise his musical creations. Yet there is no question but that he possessed the divine spark of genius, only it was revealed more clearly in his vocal than in his orchestral compositions. "Penthesilia" is more striking in its ideas than in its orchestration, but even these ideas are very unequal, at times furious, at times conventional.

The March of the Amazons is a strong feature of the work, yet we fancy that it might easily become as hackneyed, on repeated hearing, as Raff's "Lenore" parade. The bold beginning of the work is one of its strong features, so are the fanfares that summon the Amazons to their march to Troy. Best of all is the fiery ending, which lost nothing in Mr. Wendling's reading. The tender and tuneful "Dream of the Feast of Roses" is in effective contrast with the surrounding fury. In almost every part of the work one can find the impatience and unrestraint of an impetuous genius. It is easy to understand how the Brahmsites of Vienna may have attacked Wolf quite honestly, yet most unjustly. It seems as if criticism would never learn the lesson of studying carefully anything that is radically different from the school it loves best.

Liszt's favorite concerto is a free work, a rhapsody rather than a concerto, but it is popular and intelligible in the midst of all its abandon, in spite of the jesting words ("Das verstent ihr alle nicht") which the composer once attached to its chief figure. Mme. Samaroff has sprung into such prominence that she stands today as one of the world's famous female pianists. She is as reliable as a rock and has poetry and technique so well united that she is successful in almost everything she attempts.

Yet we did not find this concerto as rhapsodical as it might have been; we did not discern the leonine vein which D'Albert or Rosenthal would have given to it. There was more of suavity, more of elegance, than Liszt intended here. Nevertheless there was surety everywhere and excellent ensemble; there was great brilliancy too in her octave and chord work and the final march of triumph was so effective that a very great outburst of enthusiasm followed the close and Mme. Samaroff was recalled (unless we miscounted) six times!

Liszt's E flat concerto is always better received than his greater concerto in A. In just the same manner Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony always takes precedence of his nobler E minor symphony. If ever the Muscovite stood clearly revealed in tones it is in this symphony, and yet the Russians reproached Tschaikowsky with not being "national" enough in his music! The young Russians inscribed "Para Domoi" ("let us get home") upon their banners, but their idea of getting home seemed to be to confine themselves to a musical diet of Caviar only. Such a symphony as this in E minor does more to advance Russian music than all that the efforts towards nationalism that Balakireff, Cui, and the subsequent "reformers" could do.

The great mastery of the wood-wind which Tschaikowsky possessed was in evidence from the very beginning, and the bassoons especially did excellent work. Tschaikowsky's gloom is chiefly achieved by sending clarinettes down into the "chalumeau" register and causing bassoons and brasses to growl softly in the sub-cellar. The first movement ended in the depths and the second began there. In this latter movement the horn gave its beautiful theme in a flawless manner and the subsequent development of its chief figure in imitative counterpoint and with many other devices was very interesting. Again the clarinette went into its lowest register and its breadth in the ending deserves mention.

The Waltz movement is far less powerful than the rest of the work. Suddenly one is transported from Muscovite vigor and intensity to the Chesterfieldian suavity of a Parisian ball-room. The waltz does not admit of symphonic use as the minuet does. The minuet is marked, in music, with the same rhythm as the waltz, but while the minuet is a true ¾ rhythm, the waltz is in reality 6-4, a more soothing, swingy and monotonous effect. The transition from the minuet into the waltz can be studied best in some of the minuets of Schubert, which begin to tend towards a 6-4 swing.

The waltz in this symphony had much reiteration and was, in itself, too elegant for this fiery symphony, but it formed a good foil to the Finale, which was earnest from its very beginning. There was much of folk-song strength in this finale. The contrasts were effective and the climaxes full of energy and grandeur. The development is ingenious enough, contrapuntal skill is frequently displayed, and the movement is truly symphonic in its union of intellectuality and emotion. The lack of this equipoise in most modern orchestral music is the bane of the concert-programme today.

It is a far cry from Brahms to Tschaikowsky; they are almost opposites; they could not comprehend one another; yet both of them have proved, in different ways, that the symphonic well has not yet run dry. They have been vigorous and sturdy in expression, and absolutely sure of their effects, without becoming ascetic, ugly, puzzling or prolix. Would that our musical extremists would go and do likewise.

—H. C. Tolman.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date APR 5- 1908

DR. MUCK DISABLED.

Mr. Carl Wendling, concert-master, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Boston on March 27 and 28, and will do so on April 3 and 4, for Dr. Muck's right arm is in such condition that he must give it a complete rest, if he is to escape serious trouble. Last winter when in Providence, in trying to open a carriage door which stuck, he struck the back of his hand against the little button which holds down the curtain. It caused him some discomfort at the time, but he did not think very much of it, and did not take his physician's advice to rest his arm for a week. It seems that he had the misfortune to strike one of the long nerves that runs up the arm, with the result that for the past two or three weeks, he has suffered much discomfort with it, and was able to conduct only a few of the concerts on the last trip of the orchestra. By giving his arm a complete rest now, there will be no danger of anything serious resulting from the injury. Mr. Wendling, who has been one of the most satisfactory concert-masters the orchestra has ever had, has won new laurels in the difficult position of conducting.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date APR 5- 1908

Mr. Max Fiedler, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning unusual praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his programme among other things were the Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung," and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler evidently does not share the prejudice of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audience of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. It is an interesting fact that the only music of Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year was the "Kaisermarsch."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

Carl Wendling, concert-master, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Boston on March 27 and 28, and will do so on April 3 and 4, for Dr. Muck's right arm is in such condition that he must give it a complete rest if he is to escape serious trouble. Last winter, when in Providence, in trying to open a carriage door which stuck, he struck the back of his hand against the little button which holds down the curtain. It seems that he had the misfortune to strike one of the long nerves that run up the arm, with the result that for the past two or three weeks he has suffered much discomfort with it and was able to conduct only a few of the concerts on the last trip of the orchestra.

Max Fiedler, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning unusual praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his progamme, among other things, were the Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung" and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler evidently does not share the prejudice of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audience of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. It is an interesting fact that the only music of Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year was the "Kaisermarsch."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

MUSICAL GOSSIP.

Carl Wendling, concert master, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Boston on March 27 and 28, for Dr. Muck's right arm is in such condition that he must give it a complete rest. Last winter when in Providence, in trying to open a carriage door which stuck, he struck the back of his hand and bruised a nerve. For the last two or three weeks he has suffered much discomfort with it, and was able to conduct only a few of the concerts on the last trip of the orchestra. By giving his arm a complete rest now, there will be no danger of serious results.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his programme, among other things, were the Funeral music from "Götterdämmerung" and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler may not share the feeling of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audiences of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. The only music of Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year was the "Kaisermarsch."

[183]

...RIBE—APRIL 5, 1908. POST, APRIL 5, 1908

Olga Samaroff Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

Dr Muck being ill with neuritis and unable to use his conducting arm, last night's symphony concert was conducted by Herr Carl Wendling, the concert-master of the orchestra. Herr Wendling conducted splendidly, making somewhat hard work of it for himself, and at times apparently lifting the whole weight of the orchestra by his single arm. The players were with him all the way, and a person with poor eyesight would have been troubled to say whether Wendling or Muck held the baton.

The program began with Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," which is based on the tragedy of the same name by Heinrich von Kleist; then came the Liszt concerto in E flat major, with Mme Olga Samaroff at the piano, and finally the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 5—a program impossible of different arrangement, yet having a curious effect in its sequence of a let-down from a great tension, and then a taking up of a tremendous emotional burden again. One was tired at the end; also the pianist suffered by the program arrangement, for one forgot her marvelous performance in the upheavals round it.

For Mme Samaroff's performance was no less than marvelous. She is exceedingly good to see at a piano; those long, wonderfully pliant hands that float or flicker over the keyboard; the modest yet confident reading of a freakish, ungrateful composition, the lightning of her attack and the superb technic, all make her most pleasing to the appreciator of piano playing. Without the strength for the topmost hights of fortissimo, without the weight and crash of the masculine player—and at times almost drowned by an enthusiastic wind section—she made the concerto almost intelligible, and played the "motto theme" like a dancing will-o'-the-wisp.

The savage, terrible music of Hugo Wolf's setting to Kleist's tragedy, which opened the concert, has been played here before, the first time being in 1904. It was written shortly before Wolf was confined in a madhouse, and indeed when he was discharged for the first time Wolf himself, supposed to be cured, said: "It's a pity I ever wrote such trash." Nevertheless, and notwithstanding that at its first rehearsal in 1886 the orchestra laughed, there was no laughing at it as trash last night. It had a reading as fiery as Wolf's own imagination could have demanded, and was as moving emotionally as it was interesting. It is not a thing that will be played often.

The Tschaikowsky symphony most nearly adheres of all his works to symphonic form. Yet, after hearing two performances of it, the composer regarded it as a failure. Certainly, as played last night, it did not take the hearer to the hights reached by the "Pathetic" symphony. It is dramatic, it is the movement of great qualities in contention, and it is tragic, even in the magnificent crimson of its finale. But the very thematic repetition which makes it a wonder of construction robs it of the chiefest characteristics of Tschaikowsky. The repeated climaxes of the first movement thrash emotion until it can bear no more.

The symphony was beautifully played; the ensembles were clear and the tempi where demanded flexible and wilful as the composer himself could have asked.

It is uncertain yet whether Dr Muck will resume his work as conductor of the Symphony concerts this week. At any rate, whether he or Mr Wendling conducts, the 21st program will be as follows: Overture to "Firgaro's Wedding," Mazort; symphony in E-flat major, No. 2, Ph Em Bach; overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; symphony No. 3, Henry K. Hadley.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...
Date ...

The Boston Post published the following interesting little interview with Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony orchestra, regarding his successor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg:

"Dr. Muck, a fellow-student with Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of next season in Leipsig during the years of 1878-80, spoke interestingly of his recollections of the man concerning whom there is so much curiosity.

"'Of Mr. Fiedler's personality,' said he, 'I can tell you little. When we were students together in Leipsig he was a quiet, reserved, very earnest and ambitious worker. As you know, he was at that time very frail in appearance, and we feared that he would die of consumption. Though there were the most friendly relations between us all, he had few intimates. He was always studying and was a prodigious pianist at that time. He rarely poined our larks, and we saw little of him save in the classroom, and occasionally when he, a quiet observer, was present in the evening at some house.

"'Neither he nor I conducted at the time. He is a self-made man in this respect as in others. It was later that he sprang into prominence in this capacity by himself, organizing and conducting a series of orchestral concerts in Hamburg. Since then his fame has spread with remarkable rapidity, until there is now no conductor more well known in Europe. I know him to be a broad and most extensively educated musician, one well grounded in the classics, but a very ardent disciple of the modern school. Of his character as a conductor I will tell you this—he is the right man for the position.'"

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Wendling Again Conducts—Mme. Samaroff Gives Brilliant Performance of Liszt's Concerto

Dr. Muck is as yet unable to use his arm, and Mr. Wendling was again called upon to conduct the 20th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra, the programme consisting of Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," Liszt's E flat piano concerto, and Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony. Mme. Olga Samaroff was soloist.

The "Penthesilea," when given for the first time at these concerts in 1904, disappointed many of the admirers of Wolf. It may be said at once that the composition falls short in more than a single instance, that it frequently fails to reach the dramatic heights of the poem which gave rise to its being.

It should also be remarked that there are few works by modern composers more truly indicative of a rich creative faculty, more painfully alive with only partially uttered thoughts of impressive daring and originality.

Wolf, whose enthusiasm amounted to madness, was a frenetic admirer of Heinrich von Kleist, after whose tragedy the work heard yesterday is modelled. This composition was written at a white heat by a youth and a genius of 23, a composer of fertile invention and towering imagination, fired with overpowering emotions of the intensely human drama of the woman who in perverse rage slew the object of her passion. Wolf had not at the time reached the zenith of his creative powers, nor was his technical mastery sufficient to cope with the task he had set himself. Indeed, it is a question whether his obsession—no lesser term would be sufficient—with his subject did not prove in some degree a stumbling block. Would not Berlioz's "Les Troyens," a gigantic inspiration, have been an achievement of more sustained strength if the composer had been capable of taking himself and his subject more calmly?

The opening pages of "Penthesilea" are vivid and effective. The amorous middle passage, or the passage which should be amorous—that suggested by the "Dream of the Feast of Roses"—is far less striking; but it is in the final section that one becomes most aware of a passionate voice choking for utterance, of a desire for expression so overmastering as to be partly defeated by its own vehemence and the tormenting consciousness of impotence to completely convey striving thoughts that must out. We are told that Wolf, dissatisfied with the latter portions of his work, rewrote them while in the Svetlin Asylum, in 1897, but that he later, in disgust, destroyed the new version.

Tschaikowsky, as he proceeded from his first to his sixth symphony, diverged further and further from the classical conception of the form. He became the more human and the less abstract as a musician. This fifth symphony, though conceived from a very personal standpoint, speaks of a theme that makes the whole world kin. No doubt as Beethoven, in his fifth—and one involuntarily makes comparisons that are disadvantageous to the work of the Russian—Tchaikowsky would also speak of fate, which knocks at the door, as he had previously done, in more pessimistic vein, in the fourth symphony.

In us all there is a fear which pursues and dogs our heels, a dweller on the threshold who must be conquered at every turn. So, with his darkly colored, fateful theme, whose inexorable presence persistently manifests itself in the restless, world-weary opening moment, in a romance that is all love-making and noonshine, that clouds the last measures of a doleful waltz, but finally emerges as a chant of triumph in the measures of as optimistic music as Tchaikowsky ever penned, does the composer speak, in tones that are naively frank and poignantly human, of the struggle through which all must pass.

So much for the motive of the symphony. How will it stand as a work of art? As a unit whose grand emotional content is eternally preserved by a structure the beauty and perfection of which will stay forever and appeal to each succeeding generation?

Since Mme. Samaroff first played the Liszt concerto in this city in 1906 she has materially strengthened her grip upon the piece. Her performance yesterday was very clean in execution and rhythm—in the latter respect it was almost overaccentuated—and her handling of the concerto was more authoritative than formerly. The self-control that this young artist manifests is always a matter of astonishment and admiration. In spite of the exhilarating speed at which the finale was taken there was always the feeling of reserve strength, and the pace was never such that a note was dropped or a theme entered unprepared. There was also a more sensuous quality of tone in the adagio, and the recitative passages in that movement were declaimed in a highly dramatic manner. Mme. Samaroff was repeatedly recalled.

Mr. Wendling we have to thank for a reading of Wolf's symphonic poem which said all that could be said for that composer, and for a very eloquent, if not entirely characteristic interpretation of Tschaikowsky's symphony.

The programme of next week will be as follows: Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," Mozart; symphony in E flat major, No. 2, Philip Emmanuel Bach; overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; symphony No. 3 (first time), Henry K. Hadley. Mr. Hadley's symphony is looked forward to with much interest, for he is one of the most promising and rapidly rising young American composers of today. The symphony, which is in the key of B minor, has been received with favor in Berlin and other German cities, where it has been performed under the direction of the composer.

ADVERTISER APRIL 5, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Wolf—"Penthesilia." Symphonic poem.
Liszt—Piano concerto in E flat.
Pianist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 5, E minor.

Mr. Wendling conducted once more, since Dr. Muck's arm is not yet well. Mr. Wendling is not as yet a graceful conductor, but he understands his score, he knows what he wants and he generally attains it. He has conducted but little heretofore and his virile readings augur well for his future in this field.

Poor Hugo Wolf! When one thinks upon his miserable life and many misfortunes one is apt to over-praise his musical creations. Yet there is no question but that he possessed the divine spark of genius, only it was revealed more clearly in his vocal than in his orchestral compositions. "Penthesilia" is more striking in its ideas than in its orchestration, but even these ideas are very unequal, at times furious, at times conventional.

The March of the Amazons is a strong feature of the work, yet we fancy that it might easily become as hackneyed, on repeated hearing, as Raff's "Lenore" parade. The bold beginning of the work is one of its strong features, so are the fanfares that summon the Amazons to their march to Troy. Best of all is the fiery ending, which lost nothing in Mr. Wendling's reading. The tender and tuneful "Dream of the Feast of Roses" is in effective contrast with the surrounding fury. In almost every part of the work one can find the impatience and unrestraint of an impetuous genius. It is easy to understand how the Brahmsites of Vienna may have attacked Wolf quite honestly, yet most unjustly. It seems as if criticism would never learn the lesson of studying carefully anything that is radically different from the school it loves best.

Liszt's favorite concerto is a free work, a rhapsody rather than a concerto, but it is popular and intelligible in the midst of all its abandon, in spite of the jesting words ("Das versteht ihr alle nicht") which the composer once attached to its chief figure. Mme. Samaroff has sprung into such prominence that she stands today as one of the world's famous female pianists. She is as reliable as a rock and has poetry and technique so well united that she is successful in almost everything she attempts.

Yet we did not find this concerto as rhapsodical as it might have been; we did not discern the leonine vein which D'Albert or Rosenthal would have given to it. There was more of suavity, more of elegance, than Liszt intended here. Nevertheless there was surety everywhere and excellent ensemble; there was great brilliancy too in her octave and chord work and the final march of triumph was so effective that a very great outburst of enthusiasm followed the close and Mme. Samaroff was recalled (unless we miscounted) six times!

Liszt's E flat concerto is always better received than his greater concerto in A. In just the same manner Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony always takes precedence of his nobler E minor symphony. If ever the Muscovite stood clearly revealed in tones it is in this symphony, and yet the Russians reproached Tschaikowsky with not being "national" enough in his music! The young Russians inscribed "Para Domoi" ("let us get home") upon their banners, but their idea of getting home seemed to be to confine themselves to a musical diet of Caviar only. Such a symphony as this in E minor does more to advance Russian music than all that the efforts towards nationalism that Balakireff, Cui, and the subsequent "reformers" could do.

The great mastery of the wood-wind which Tschaikowsky possessed was in evidence from the very beginning, and the bassoons especially did excellent work. Tschaikowsky's gloom is chiefly achieved by sending clarinettes down into the "chalumeau" register and causing bassoons and brasses to growl softly in the sub-cellar. The first movement ended in the depths and the second began there. In this latter movement the horn gave its beautiful theme in a flawless manner and the subsequent development of its chief figure in imitative counterpoint and with many other devices was very interesting. Again the clarinette went into its lowest register and its breadth in the ending deserves mention.

The Waltz movement is far less powerful than the rest of the work. Suddenly one is transported from Muscovite vigor and intensity to the Chesterfieldian suavity of a Parisian ball-room. The waltz does not admit of symphonic use as the minuet does. The minuet is marked, in music, with the same rhythm as the waltz, but while the minuet is a true ¾ rhythm, the waltz is in reality 6-4, a more soothing, swingy and monotonous effect. The transition from the minuet into the waltz can be studied best in some of the minuets of Schubert, which begin to tend towards a 6-4 swing.

The waltz in this symphony had much reiteration and was, in itself, too elegant for this fiery symphony, but it formed a good foil to the Finale, which was earnest from its very beginning. There was much of folk-song strength in this finale. The contrasts were effective and the climaxes full of energy and grandeur. The development is ingenious enough, contrapuntal skill is frequently displayed, and the movement is truly symphonic in its union of intellectuality and emotion. The lack of this equipoise in most modern orchestral music is the bane of the concert-programme today.

It is a far cry from Brahms to Tschaikowsky; they are almost opposites; they could not comprehend one another; yet both of them have proved, in different ways, that the symphonic well has not yet run dry. They have been vigorous and sturdy in expression, and absolutely sure of their effects, without becoming ascetic, ugly, puzzling or prolix. Would that our musical extremists would go and do likewise.

Louis C. Elson.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...
Date APR 5- 1908

DR. MUCK DISABLED.

Mr. Carl Vendling, concert-master, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Boston on March 27 and 28, and will do so on April 3 and 4, for Dr. Muck's right arm is in such condition that he must give it a complete rest, if he is to escape serious trouble. Last winter when in Providence, in trying to open a carriage door which stuck, he struck the back of his hand against the little button which holds down the curtain. It seems that he had the misfortune to strike one of the long nerves that runs up the arm, with the result that for the past two or three weeks he has suffered much discomfort with it, and was able to conduct only a few of the concerts on the last trip of the orchestra. By giving his arm a complete rest now, there will be no danger of anything serious resulting from the injury. Mr. Wendling, who has been one of the most satisfactory concert-masters the orchestra has ever had, has won new laurels in the difficult position of conducting.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...
Date APR 5- 1908

Mr. Max Fiedler, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning unusual praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his programme among other things were the Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung," and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler evidently does not share the prejudice of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audience of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. It is an interesting fact that the only music of Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year, was the "Kaisermarsch."

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date

Carl Wendling, concert-master, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Boston on March 27 and 28, and will do so on April 3 and 4, for Dr. Muck's right arm is in such condition that he must give it a complete rest if he is to escape serious trouble. Last winter, when in Providence, in trying to open a carriage door which stuck, he struck the back of his hand against the little button which holds down the curtain. It seems that he had the misfortune to strike one of the long nerves that run up the arm, with the result that for the past two or three weeks he has suffered much discomfort with it, and was able to conduct only a few of the concerts on the last trip of the orchestra.

Max Fiedler, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning unusual praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his progamme, among other things, were the Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung" and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler evidently does not share the prejudice of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audience of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. It is an interesting fact that the only music of Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year was the "Kaisermarsch."

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date

MUSICAL GOSSIP.

Carl Wendling, concert master, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Boston on March 27 and 28, for Dr. Muck's right arm is in such condition that he must give it a complete rest. Last winter when in Providence, in trying to open a carriage door which stuck, he struck the back of his hand and bruised a nerve. For the last two or three weeks he has suffered much discomfort with it, and was able to conduct only a few of the concerts on the last trip of the orchestra. By giving his arm a complete rest now there will be no danger of serious results.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, has been winning praise in Berlin, where he conducted recently one of the concerts of the Wagner Association of that city. On his programme, among other things, were the Funeral music from "Götterdämmerung" and "Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Fiedler may not share the feeling of Dr. Muck against the performance of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas in concert, and the audiences of the Boston Symphony will probably hear more Wagner than they have during the incumbency of Dr. Muck. The only music of Wagner played at a symphony concert by Dr. Muck during the present year was the "Kaisermarsch."

First Performance of Hadley's Symphony.

"Samson and Delilah" to be Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

People's Choral Union—Other Concerts.

The principal work performed at last night's symphony concert was Henry Hadley's third symphony, which was given for the first time in America. It was composed in the summer of 1906, partly in Italy and partly in Munich.

In the midst of much of the modern French and German compositions Mr Hadley's symphony stands forth clean, clear and simple. However, it raises no great emotions in the hearer; the audience is neither spellbound nor gasping at the close of any movement. It is color in tone, stirring only by moments, waking admiration, but rarely carrying the hearer to great hights. The composer said of it, "The work is in the usual form and is vigorous and buoyant." Perhaps no better description could be made. It begins with a bold theme, which might in extenso be noble, but it has the air of suggesting, of being only half given. All through the first movement of the symphony this theme returns, yet it never wakes one's soul nor wrings the heart.

The second movement (andante tranquillo) contains a passionate melody, all too short, over a "landscape" with tinkling church bells insisting unobtrusively, even through the dissonances. As the movement began at the Friday rehearsal, fire apparatus went by the hall on Massachusetts av, and it was ironical how the apparatus bells and whistles fell in with Mr Hadley's scheme, and the higher voices take it up, the oboe objecting with sudden malice. And the movement falls to a golden end.

The scherzo has a fantastic little quicksilver dance of a theme and is conventional in form, going through a trio—as if a Pierrot should dance a minuet.

The final movement (allegro) steps into a brilliant, warm B major march, chanted triumphantly, and except for some thickness in the scoring, some rather heavy writing of the inner notes which fogs it, a brilliant bit. It goes higher and higher in color, and ends in a shout.

Mr Hadley is infinitely nearer the heart than some of his contemporaries, but concerts of his works are no places for musical lightweights. Herr Carl Wendling conducted with immense spirit.

The program began happily enough last night with Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," which Dr Muck conducted with his left hand, as he did also the Beethoven overture to "Coriolanus," with its tragic explosions and horror, and the No. 2 symphony of Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach, which was played for the first time in Boston. This symphony is in three movements, all joined together, and is very short. it delights in passages in octaves, in unisons of mixed tones, and in a robust heartiness which is good hearing in the midst of moderns. It is satisfying music, in a word, without calling up either pictures or emotions.

Friday of this week being Good Friday the regular rehearsal will be given on Thursday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening. Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be the soloist. The program contains Beethoven's first symphony, Ertel's "Midnight Review," a pianoforte concerto by Emmanuel Moor and the overture to d'Albert's "Il Improvisatore." The second and third numbers are played for the first time in Boston.

HERALD—BOSTON, APRIL 12, 1908.

21ST SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

First Performance of New Composition by Henry Hadley Takes Place.

The 21st Symphony concert was given last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck, who was welcomed heartily, conducted the first three works: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," C. P. E. Bach's Symphony in E flat major, No. 2, and Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus." Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted Henry Hadley's Symphony in B minor No. 3, which was performed for the first time in this country.

The overture to Mozart's opera—and there is not a more animated and sparkling prelude to a comedy—was played with delightful delicacy, the finest sense of proportion, and irresistible brio. The symphony by Bach was played here for the first time. It is one of four composed at Hamburg in 1776. The first of the set has been heard here. The second is in three movements, which are closely connected. The first is a lively allegro, which shows Bach's independence of formulas as they existed in his period. The free use of the wind instruments is also noticeable. The second movement is a short Larghetto, which is Mozartian both in mood and in form of expression. The third movement, an allegretto, is the least interesting of the three. As a whole the symphony is a charming little work that gave immediate pleasure and might well be repeated. Dr. Muck's reading of the noble "Coriolanus" overture was impressive.

There is natural interest here in Mr. Hadley's works, for he is a Somerville boy, he has indisputable talent, and as composer and conductor he is fast gaining an honorable reputation in Europe. This symphony, his third, was composed in Italy and at Munich in the summer of 1906. It was performed for the first time under the composer's direction at Berlin last December. The music is absolute, that is to say it has no programme, although Mr. Hadley writes that the second movement was suggested by hearing afternoons the bells from a distant church which he heard in a secluded spot in woods near Monza, where he worked out of doors.

The symphony is in the usual form. The first movement is not one of special distinction. The themes are fresh, but the development is conventional, although it is written by a practised hand, and the instrumentation is in no way remarkable. The two movements that follow have decided character. The Andante, with its suggestion of church bells, its suave chief melody, its romantic contrasting section, has real beauty, and the music is singularly euphonious through choice of harmonies and masterly instrumentation. Much may be justly expected of the man who has written this andante and the scherzo that follows. This scherzo, which is technically difficult, is original in conception and in the expression of thought. The finale is not on a level with the two preceding movements. The chief theme is rather ordinary, the treatment of the second reminds one of Puccini, and the movement as a whole is an example of routine facility.

The public rehearsal this week will be on Thursday afternoon.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1908

Concerts Next Week

Dr. Muck will conduct as usual at the next pair of Symphony Concerts, but unusually the afternoon concert falls on Thursday instead of Friday—the annual exception of Holy Week—with the evening concert, of course, on Saturday. Beethoven's ninth symphony is impossible at the Symphony Concerts because there is no room on the stage for the chorus of the finale without the extension of the platform and the consequent removal of the rows of seats that are regularly occupied by subscribers. Seven of the remaining eight, Dr. Muck has already played, and next week he completes the series with the first and earliest of them all. Then for the middle pieces of the programme stand a new concerto for piano and orchestra by Emmanuel Moor with Mr. Bauer to play the solo part. Of Moor, a singular and little known composer, half English, half Hungarian, who has been writing rhapsodic music for twenty years and who now at last is beginning to find a few orchestras and virtuosi willing to perform it, we shall have more to say next Wednesday. Suffice it now that Mr. Bauer takes a discoverer's joy of the concerto and was eager to play it here for the first time in America. The other new piece is a tone-poem by Paul Ertel, composer and reviewer of Berlin—"The Midnight Review" of the ghosts of Napoleon's soldiers by the ghost of their summoning emperor. The fourth and last item on the programme is d'Albert's rich and brilliant overture to his opera, "The Improvisatore," and now "Tiefland" has made d'Albert an operatic composer worth the heeding.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Conducts Again—Two Classic Overtures, an Old Symphony by Emmanuel Bach and a New Symphony by Henry Hadley — The Progress of the Young Composer

Dr. Muck conducted the first three numbere on the programme of the twenty-first rehearsal, while Mr. Wendling conducted the new symphony by Hadley which he had rehearsed. The programme follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony in D major.....Emanuel Bach
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in B minor.....Henry Hadley

The ever-delightful Mozart overture, before which even the most lukewarm critic of Mozart must glow with enthusiasm, was played with contagious vivacity of spirit, remarkable precision and a fresh and piquant gayety. It is a matter of equal triumph for orchestra and conductor that its flowing passages came out with such fleet and yet clear velocity. Especially notable was the genuine simplicity which Dr. Muck gave to the piece without the slightest attempt at expressive modernization. His instinct might be relied upon to recognize that here such effort would be fruitless.

The Emanuel Bach symphony offers an unusual opportunity for the strings, and seldem has their precision of attack and warmth of color seemed more appealing. The chief characteristic of the music itself seems to be a dignified elegance rather than depth or incisive brilliance of expression. Emanuel Bach was unfortunate in possessing little of the marvellous contrapuntal dexterity and the universality of melodic expression which were the distinguishing traits of his father's art. Neither had he progressed far enough in the evolution of sonata or symphonic form which gave the conciseness and structural coherence which we find in the best symphonies and sonatas by Haydn and Mozart. Nor it must be confessed, is there any hint in the tentative experiments of this symphony of the grandeur and profound grasp of expression to be found in the chamber works, overtures and symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. Nevertheless the pioneer efforts of Emanuel Bach have their abiding tribute in the works of his immediate successors, and from the historic standpoint alone it was abundantly worth while that it should be heard. Moreover, by his careful and polished interpretation Dr. Muck gave the music its due value.

In the familiar overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven attains the eloquent expression of a tragic subject in his middle period. Here, also, Dr. Muck remained steadfast to the letter and the spirit of the composer's intention. Seldom has this overture been more brilliantly and flawlessly played, yet here it would seem as if something of the spirit of modernization might be justifiable; a slightly more definite contrast between first and second theme, and more insistence on the tragic nature of the conclusion. Yet after all Dr. Muck was more faithful to the purist's point of view.

Mr. Hadley has now been living for some years in Europe and there are tangible results to be seen in his music. His poem for orchestra on "Salome" showed greater warmth of expression, a more tangible realization of mood than in any of his previous works. There was an evident increase also in technical dexterity. Consequently there was an unusual curiosity and interest to compare his latest work in the symphonic form with its predecessor "The Four Seasons" composed in this country. In this latter work, which had the unusual distinction of gaining two prizes, its chief characteristics were an uncommon facility in technical treatment, as well as a distinct faculty for handling orchestral forces. Musically this symphony had less distinction, and the characterization of the contrasting seasons (a difficult subject at best), was inclined towards the commonplace, in spite of the correctness and by no means infrequent cleverness of expression. This facility of expression has hitherto remained virtually an obstacle to Mr. Hadley's evident and praiseworthy ambition, and the extent to which this quality would be evident in this new symphony was a matter for conjecture. Accordingly the first movements gives an impression of somewhat unsubstantial character theoretically.

The first theme is not particularly impressive, nor is its elaboration striking; the second theme is far more interesting, both melodically and harmonically. There is no definite sense of a clear and forceful coherence, yet there is more individuality of expression than in the corresponding movement of "The Four Seasons," a growth in depth of sentiment and a conspicuous skill in orchestral treatment. The second movement leaves a more tangible and convincing memory to the listener. It establishes a graceful and picturesque mood at once. The recurring bell phrase is woven subtlety into the development of the opening theme; there is variety and picturesqueness of treatment. If the middle episode is somewhat less persuasive, the return of the first mood and the conclusion are felicitous and poetic. The scherzo is decidedly bright and skilful in its contrast of rhythm, but the musical material is not on as high a level as the two preceding movements. The finale begins effectively, but its treatment is wanting in substantial development, in spite of a brilliant peroration and close. As a whole, a work in which interesting ideas and genuine fancy jostle those that are less worthy and more commonplace. Still, this symphony shows an indisputable advance both in musical substance and treatment, and the use of the orchestra throughout shows greater individuality of style, as well as a more precise command of the instrumental resources. Mr. Wendling carried through the performance as excellently, and he is much to be congratulated for his creditable work.

W. P. H.

JOURNAL—MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1908.

HADLEY'S SYMPHONY GIVEN FIRST READING

Henry Hadley's B minor symphony was performed for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Saturday night at the twenty-first concert, Carl Wendling conducted. The work was written in 1906 in Italy and in Munich, and its initial performance was in Berlin last December under the composer's direction.

The symphony is not especially inspiring, being in the usual form with a first movement of little importance. The andante or second movement is a well painted town picture with a figure for church bells, with a romantic chief theme developed with scholarly skill. The scherzo is technically difficult and has an exquisite trio. The last movement possesses little to interest and is the weakest of the four. The symphony leaves behind the impression that Mr. Hadley was continually climbing, climbing, rising, rising, and getting nowhere. It was given a masterly reading.

Dr. Muck conducted Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," C. P. E. Bach's E flat symphony and Beethoven's noble overture to "Coriolanus." He did not use a baton and conducted with his left hand. The Bach symphony was played for the first time in Boston.

POST, APRIL 12, 1908

BY OLIN DOWNES

HADLEY'S SYMPHONY HEARD FOR FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

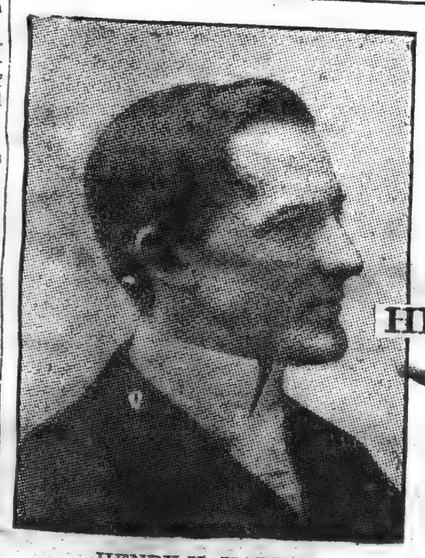
The programme of the 21st public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; symphony in E flat major, No. 2, Philip Emannuel Bach; overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven; symphony No. 3 in B minor, Op. 60, Henry K. Hadley (first time in America).

Dr. Muck's arm was sufficiently recovered to permit of his conducting the performance of the first three numbers of the programme; Mr. Wendling conducted that of the symphony, which he had rehearsed.

It was very evident that Dr. Muck's temporary absence from rehearsals and concerts had not displaced him in the regard of his men, for they responded to his wishes with the utmost enthusiasm and alacrity. There were excellent performances of the two overtures and the Bach symphony.

The prelude by Mozart was taken at a very rapid tempo, its execution was wonderfully clean, and the quality of tone was light and clear and buoyant. But this overture is not by length or construction well adapted for the concert room. The Bach symphony, like the overture, is vigorous, beautiful, open-air music. It is good to have frequent reminders of the fact that Philip Emmanuel, though the son of his father, was a composer of uncommon originality and fertility of invention; but this symphony is not music of today, and it is to modern ears a trifle prolix. The Beethoven overture holds its place, a dramatic masterpiece of the highest order, and the performance was a convincing revelation of its inherent qualities.

It would not be well, after a single hearing, to make any conclusive remarks on the subject of Mr. Hadley's latest symphony, a symphony which is the work of a sincere and gifted composer who is continually gaining in mastership. Mr. Hadley, who was born at Somerville in 1871, is now meeting with much encouragement as a composer and conductor in Europe. The first three movements of the work heard yesterday were written in the months of June and July, 1906, in Italy, near Milan. "The second movement was suggested on hearing every afternoon the bells from a distant church, which were wafted across the fields to a secluded spot in the woods, where I worked out of doors." The final movement came into being at Munich the following August.



HENRY K. HADLEY
Of Somerville, whose third Symphony was given for the first time in America at the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday.

There is some good material in the first movement of the symphony, and some interesting moments, but though from a technical standpoint the section hangs together fairly well, from a musical standpoint it does not, on preliminary acquaintance. The ideas are not of a truly symphonic character; you do not feel the "long breath." The slow movement is a felicitous tone-sketch—it would be called by some "atmospheric." The scherzo seems at present the most vivid and original part of the work. The finale, while very evidently written in consonance with the spirit of the other sections, is disproportionately short, and it is as if the composer took up his pen in a different frame of mind, from that in which he had previously been writing. This movement, in itself, is concise and effective.

So much for impressions. Mr. Hadley writes sane, healthy music. He does not, happily, see fit to wallow in the slough of psychological despond, as so many young men of today are prone to do. If one compares this symphony to "The Four Seasons," heard here in 1905, a great advance is at once perceptible, an advance that gives brilliant promise for the future. This promise we feel the more faith in, inasmuch as Mr. Hadley is industrious and self-critical, and unquestionably working in the right direction.

Dr. Muck will conduct the entire programme of the concerts next week, which will take place on Thursday afternoon instead of Friday, and on Saturday night. The programme will be as follows: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; "Midnight Review," Ertel; a piano concerto by Emmanuel Moor, and the overture to d'Albert's "Il Improvisatore." The second and third numbers will be given for the first time in Boston. Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, will be soloist.

HERALD—TUESDAY, APRIL 14, 1908

HESS TO RETURN.

Will Resume Post of Concert Master of Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the announcement that Mr. Willy Hess, who was granted, last spring, leave of absence for a year from his office of concert master, will retake his position at the beginning of next season. It has already been stated that Mr. Carl Wendling, who has been concert master this season, has decided to return to Stuttgart, his home, solely on account of family reasons.

Mr. Hess has filled a few solo engagements this winter in England and in cities of Germany. On his return he will establish with Mr. Alwin Schroeder a string quartet, but this quartet will not be connected in any manner whatever with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nor will his duties as first violinist of this quartet conflict with his duties as concert master. It is stated that Mr. Schroeder will not return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[184]

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.
C. P. E. Bach. Symphony in E flat.
Beethoven. "Coriolanus" Overture.
Henry Hadley. Symphony in B minor. No. 3.

It was a very welcome symphonic dessert after a week of operatic feasting, and we had two conductors at the price of one, the first conducting with his left hand and the other with his right. Dr. Muck was welcomed with some effusion. His arm is not yet quite well, but he is such a born leader that we believe that he could conduct with both hands tied behind his back.

In connection with the various illnesses that seem to come to our modern conductors is it not possible that John Stuart Mill was quite right when he accused modern music of demanding more of the human brain than it could possibly furnish? Mill's remark applied to the musical auditor, but it fits with still greater force to the conductor. His brain is taxed in a superhuman manner, and nervous ailments crowd upon him. Poor Fritz Scheel lost his reason, Gericke was on the verge of physical break-down, Dr. Muck has had a species of neuritis,—to speak of American conductors only. Modern music instead of being a pleasure and an Art of beauty has become a dire and dangerous task-mistress.

Dr. Muck took the "Marriage of Figaro" overture at a furious pace. It is marked "Presto," but we hold that a Mozart "presto" is not faster than many a Liszt "Allegro." However, the strings were able to maintain the pace, in the scale-work of the chief theme and of the Coda, without blurring. We think that many modern conductors take this overture and that of "The Magic Flute" too rapidly for the best effect.

"Symphony" meant something very different in the days of Bach from what it does at present. The reviewer has in his library the first English Musical Dictionary, (1724) which defines the word as—"Airs in Two, Three, or Four Parts, for Instruments of any Kind; or the Instrumental Parts of Songs, Motets, Operas; or Concertos are so called."

J. S. Bach called his three-part Inventions "Symphonies." The symphony of this concert was of this kind but somewhat larger. Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach did not follow the sonata-allegro form of Corelli in his symphonies but indulged in strong contrasts and (for his time) good figure development. Dr. Muck took the work in strong and manly style and it made an excellent impression. It was an interesting specimen of a transition period.

C. P. E. Bach leaned far more towards the modern vein than his father did. Burney thought him greater than his father. That, of course, is absurd, but the gifted son proved that sometimes a talent can do as valuable work as a genius, for he became a chain linking the old to the new, and fulfilled a great task in the history of musical development. It was most interesting to listen to this single movement symphony in the antique form. The performance was excellent.

The two overtures of the programme were in great contrast. While the "Marriage of Figaro" overture is light and chattering, the "Coriolanus" is tragic and earnest. It received a noble reading. The strength of the Coriolanus theme was in exquisite contrast with the tenderness of the subordinate theme, which presumably represents the wife and mother. The syncopations and alterations of the theme on its return graphically suggest vacillation, irresolution, and finally Death. It must be remembered that it is not Shakespeare that is here represented, but Collin, the Austrian Secretary of War, who made a play upon the Roman subject. It is a pity that Beethoven never studied Shakespeare. He read a few of the plays in later life and marked the passage—in his copy of "The Merchant of Venice," but never used it (or any Shakespearian theme) musically. The "Coriolanus" overture received much applause and Dr. Muck was recalled at its end with some enthusiasm.

"How far that little candle throws his beams! So shines a good deed in this naughty world."

Now the second conductor appeared. He conducted with his right hand—also with his left, his legs, his body and his face. We have already chronicled our high estimation of Mr. Carl Wendling as a conductor. He has had but little experience, yet he grasps the salient points of a work and he brings them out of the orchestra, too. But he is as vehement in motion as the operatic Hertz himself, of whom Heine might have written,—

"Was poch'st du denn so wunderlich, mein Hertz, mein Hertz?"

A little more repose in action would bring as good results.

The Hadley symphony is a good addition to the list of American classical works. It is not as remarkable as his "Salome," but it is above all of his other works with which we are acquainted. The first movement reminds somewhat of Mahler's style, in that it gives a very dramatic picture but calls it "absolute music," that is without any definite story. This we think is a mistaken policy. When we hear the vivid contrasts, the phrases "big with fate" and with brasses, the constant reiteration of a two-noted figure without much musical significance, we have a right to ask for an explanation of the mystery. Mahler's symphonies are also often tragedies with the plot omitted.

Nevertheless, we were much impressed with the poetic beauty and the admirable skill displayed all through this first movement. There was good form evident and the length was reasonable.

The second movement (Andante Tranquillo) was also a definite picture although the composer declined to call it "programme-music." It might well be entitled "Sunday Morning," or "Dimanche au Village," or something of that sort. It is chiefly founded on a recurring figure of three notes (a "ground") given on the Glockenspiel in imitation of distant church bells. It is very ingenious, very tranquil and very beautiful.

This making of a Carillon, or chime, the foundation of a movement, is not new. Bizet did it most effectively in his "Suite Arlesienne," and Massenet gave a touch of it in his "Angelus" in "Scenes Pittoresques." But the carillon itself is more original than these. The two composers above cited use a sort of "Three Blind Mice" figure for their bells ("Mi, re, do"), while Hadley employs B, C sharp and G sharp (dominant, submediant and mediant), a quaint succession which he makes splendidly effective. The melodies worked up against these notes are very charming and in good contrast with each other. At a first hearing this movement seemed the gem of the work.

The Scherzo was less marked in character, certainly less original and striking. The finale had some fine themes and sufficient figure treatment. Best of all, Mr. Hadley did not discard melody and did not indulge in that fearful prolixity which is dreaded every time that a modern composer writes a symphony. This is a work that will grow upon acquaintance and it deserves repetition at these concerts.

Louis C. Elson.

Paderewski Hears His Star Pupil

Interested Auditor at Symphony Rehearsal—Dr. Muck Given Warm Welcome.

Society did not forget that the Symphony rehearsal date was changed to yesterday and it turned out in large numbers. Quite the most distinguished auditor there was Paderewski, who arrived late, but in season to hear his star pupil, Harold Bauer, who was the soloist. Dr. Muck received an enthusiastic welcome as he resumed the baton, using it, however, in his left hand. Mrs. John L. Gardner was there and wore a long purple cloak over her black gown. Mrs. Gordon Abbott looked stunning in a trailing gown of golden brown and a big yellow hat with brown trimmings. Mabel Daniels, just home from a long stay abroad, looked well in a black and white cloth suit and blue hat.

Among the familiar faces were those of Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Charles Bird, the Misses Gladys and Elizabeth Green, Mrs. Abby Linnell, Mrs. John Devlin, Mrs. George W. Armstrong, Mrs. Richard Hamlin Jones, Mrs. Jean Fritch Forbes, Mr. Dana Estes, Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Hauthaway, Mrs. Frederick P. Vinton, Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. L. C. Fenno, Mrs. Frederick Warren and Mrs. T. P. Gooding.

Symphony To Give Chelsea Benefit

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have offered their services for a concert to be given for the benefit of the Chelsea fire fund, and this concert will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, April 27, at 8.15 o'clock.

It is a curious fact that on Sunday evening, April 29, 1906, the orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Gericke, gave a very successful concert for the benefit of the San Francisco relief fund, and the sum of $2500 was realized, and turned over to the proper authorities. This year, with the disaster nearer home, it is expected that even more money can be realized for such a cause.

Harold Bauer, the pianist, has volunteered his services as soloist for this concert, as Madame Samaroff volunteered hers two years ago, and Dr. Muck has entered into the project with much enthusiasm. Seats will go on sale tomorrow morning at Symphony Hall.

BENEFIT CONCERT APRIL 27.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have offered their services for a ooncert to be given for the benefit of the Chelsea Fire Fund, and this concert will be given in Symphony Hall on April 27.

April 29, 1906, the orchestra gave a very successful concert for the benefit of the San Francisco Relief Fund, and $2500 was realized and turned over to the proper authorities. It is expected that even more money can be realized this year.

Mr. Harold Bauer, the pianist, has volunteered his services as soloist.

om .....

dress .....

te .....

Woodman and Mendelssohn.

—Dr. Karl Muck ends his tenure of office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, May 2. In the 48 programs he has made for Boston during the seasons of 1906-07 and 1907-08 he has presented 43 works new to the Boston public, and 24 of these were played for the first time in America.

188

EMANUEL MOOR

AN UNKNOWN COMPOSER AND HIS WORK

An Example of His Music for the First Time at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—A Note from Mr. Bauer as to the Man and His Work—The Long Obscurity That Has Hidden Him—What a Cursory Examination of His Published Pieces Discloses of His Traits—European Comment on His More Recent Pieces

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

While Emanuel Moor, whose name will figure for the first time on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concert, is virtually unknown in America, many of his works have been given in Europe, and in particular several of his concertos for various instruments have begun to attract the attention of virtuosi of the first rank. Nevertheless, the makers of the more important dictionaries of musical biography have not seen fit to include his name among the composers considered by them. Moreover, he seems to have escaped the notice of those journalists who are always ready to discover and exploit the virtues of "new men." Doubtless this is due in part to the extreme retirement of his life, and his utter concentration upon creative activity. The result is that the inquirer seeks almost in vain for any facts relating to his life and artistic career.

It is through the courtesy of Mr. Harold Bauer, who is to play Moor's piano concerto in D-flat, Op. 57, at his forthcoming appearance here, that the following statements regarding Moor and his works are presented to the readers of the Transcript. "Emanuel Moor was born in Hungary about 1862. Educated in Buda Pesth and Vienna, he came to America as accompanist for Lilli Lehmann sometime in the eighties. He was very poor and ambitious, he married an American woman of means and went to live in the country in England, when he practically disappeared from mortal ken for about fifteen years. During this time he wrote a vast quantity of music of all kinds, two operas, six symphonies, about five hundred songs, and several pieces of chamber music. He went to live in Switzerland some years ago, and while in Lausanne met some wandering musicians (Ysaye among others) who became intensely interested in his work. Since that time he has occupied himself principally in writing concertos for various instruments. He has written three concertos for violin, one of which has been played by Ysaye in London, Brussels and St. Petersburg; another by Thibaud in Leipsic, and the third by Marteau in Berlin; two 'cello concertos and one for two violoncellos, recently played in Paris by Casals and Madame Casals-Suggia; a triple concerto for piano, violin and violoncello, played by Cortot, Thibaud and Casals, and the piano concerto which I am to play, and which has hitherto only been played by Madame Marie Panthès, to whom it is dedicated, in Leipsic, Brussels and Amsterdam. His seventh symphony has recently been played at Ysaye's symphonic concerts in Brussels, and also by Mengelberg in Amsterdam."

Moor is described by a personal acquaintance as being a distinctly able man, of intelligence, education and brilliant cultivation, possessing imagination and a real literary talent. A great lover of nature, a man who penetrates to the bottom and root of things, and obviously a thinker. At this time he was composing a large choral work for which he had written the text.

As far as his artistic bent is revealed from works of his which are available for reference, Moor began with an evident distaste for the prevailing trend of modern music. He was not at all in sympathy with the subjective personalities who would subordinate considerations of form and style to the outpouring of individual emotion. Instead, he clung to the more abstract impersonal attitude, and for his models and the sources of musical development preferred to go directly to Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. He wished to avoid anything even remotely resembling preoccupation for sensational effects, and deliberately chose the classical forms as his medium of expression. Among his early works, a piano concerto was played by Benno Schoenberger in London, and a 'cello sonata by Piatti at St. James's Hall. The concerto is a work on conventional lines, in which the influence of Beethoven and possibly Brahms may be discerned. From a casual examination it does not appear to possess much spontaneity or individuality of musical expression. His second symphony in C major dedicated to the memory of Kossuth was played by Mr. Georg Henschel at his Symphony Concerts in London in March, 1895. It is a work in which classic influence is paramount, but it attains far more vigor of expression, and positive excellence in workmanship than the concerto just mentioned. In the first movement there is real development of themes in the "working-out" section of the movement, not a skilful parade of passages and modulations. At the time of its performance the London Daily Telegraph had this to say of the symphony: "Mr. Moor takes very high ground indeed, and challenges criticism in its severe form by the very loftiness of his pretentions. For this is not only a symphony marked by fulness and elaboration, but also one dedicated to a great man and a noble patriot. It is the composer's tribute made fitting by its expression of the joys and sorrows, the sad recollections and glowing hopes of a nation which has struggled and suffered, but never despaired. The musician competent to such a work must be of no common order, and as in our opinion, Mr. Moor has proved his ability, he now stands in a position higher and more honorable than before.

Hearing the new symphony, it is not at all difficult to guess the master of whose spirit Mr. Moor has taken counsel. Beethoven, we venture to say is the god of his idolatry. He works on the expanded symphonic model of that composer, to whose influence he submits not only in affairs of form, but as regards spirit and expression. All the movements are marked by a dignity and earnestness becoming the purpose to which the symphony is applied, while so careful is Mr. Moor not to abate those qualities that he keeps his themes free from the peculiarities of gypsy music, which would have lent themselves readily to 'catchy' though cheap effects. Throughout the work therefore, the composer impresses us with a sense of elevated purpose and of that deep sincerity which must be at the root of all worthy deeds."

The orchestra in this second symphony is the classical orchestra of Beethoven, with no attempt at modernity of effect. In his third symphony in D minor, composed in 1895, the same conventional scheme is observable in the first movement; moreover the musical expression is not so forceful as in the corresponding movement of the second symphony. The slow movement attains more individuality, and here the composer adds an English horn, a bass clarinet and a third trumpet to the ordinary orchestral resources. The scherzo possesses distinct grace and more elaboration of development. Other works by Moor not mentioned specifically by Mr. Bauer are a sonata for piano, a sonata for violin and piano, a sonata for 'cello and piano, a string quartet, a piano concerto in C minor and some improvisations for orchestra. Moor's two operas, "La Pompadour" after de Musset, and "The Goldsmith of Paris," are short and slight in substance; they do not give the impression of being first of all dramatic in style. If Moor has resisted thus far successfully the seductions of ultra-modern style, with its accomplanying expressive standpoint, he has nevertheless evolved an individuality in treatment based upon his artistic convictions. He has always found a way to make his expression find its fittest medium. And in this consistency of attitude he is surely worthy of respect, aside from the musical value of his achievements.

Moor has thus far met with varying treatment at the hands of the public and the critics. It may, therefore, aid this necessarily incomplete sketch of him as a man and as a composer to transcribe a few extracts from reviews of his works. While some of these are brief and unanalytic, they may afford at least some opportunity for forming a judgment of his work. Thus, when Pablo Casals played his second violoncello concerto at Amsterdam, Die Musik says: "In spite of a brilliant interpretation this work gained no response from the public." Of his sixth symphony which has been given by Steinbach in Cologne, Vollmar Andrae at Zurich, Winderstein at Leipsic and Berlin, Mengelberg at Amsterdam, the same publication says: "Hans Winderstein at the head of his Leipsic orchestra gave a second concert (in Berlin) when the chief number was the sixth symphony in E minor by Emanuel Moor. It is an extraordinary work, without significant musical or thematic invention, yet full of varied and interesting tonal effects. It is gloomy in color, yet all four movements show much work. The beginning of the first movement attracts the attention through energy of expression; if in the adagio more gentle accents show signs of light, there is seldom an instance of repose. The heavy bass instruments are especially prominent, unthematic and ill-resolved dissonances are employed luxuriantly." A violin concerto (presumably the third) was played at a Philharmonic concert in Budapest, and was dismissed as follows: "Henri Marteau brought forth for the first time a violin concerto by Emanuel Moor. It is skilfully constructed, but poverty stricken in invention." On the contrary, his A major quartet when played for the first time in Paris impressed by its command of expression, and when given at Basle at a concert of the Swiss Composers Association, it was pronounced a very pleasing work, noteworthy for genuine beauty of expression and unified development of its underlying ideas." When Casals played the violoncello concerto Op. 61 at Leipsic, a reviewer decided that "in spite of bombastic and incoherent tutti-passages and solo episodes, the old-fashioned andantino and dramatically vivid finale offered the soloist new and idiomatic material for expression." When Marteau played the third violin concerto at the "Concerts Gaveau" in Paris, the critic of the Guide Musical wrote of it that "it is a work which is not without tedium and incoherence (as in the first movement), but one may say that it is constantly interesting, finished technically, firm and austere, suffused the more often with a melancholy grace, but sometimes happily varied in brilliance and picturesque verve. The first movement, in spite of the excess of its development and some inconsequent pedal points toward the end, presents some really harmonious pages, and arrives at a conclusion that is full of brilliance. The scherzo is a fantasia in Tsigan style, sparkling and gay, with an underlying note of dissonant melancholy. The adagio brings out still more strongly the poetic character of the work, with more penetrating expression, while the violin solo closes the movement as if lost in a sober and reflective dream. The impressions of melancholy reappear, here and there, in the whirling rapidity of the festive rhythms which characterize the fourth movement, only to mingle at last in the sonorous verve and brilliance of the fine conclusion." On the other hand the Mercure Musicale, which is generally receptive towards new works, takes a more gloomy view of Moor's seventh symphony and the concerto for two violoncellos, both recent works. "But what is to be said of the symphony in E major by Emanuel Moor, played for the first time at Brussels. Six other symphonies have come from the pen of this composer, and nevertheless one searches in vain for the trace of a formula, to fix the source of an inspiration, which is pleased to wander, and to the obstinately attentive ear renders a semblance of continuity only to fall back brusquely into a void. On the whole, certain characteristics may be perceived; a pretention to richness of ideas, which permits touching on all without insistence on any, the love of pathos, and in the orchestration, a search for brilliance and violent oppositions of timbres. It seems at times as if a hostile will paralyzed spontaneity of impulse; in this thorny bush some

[195]

...nowers appear, strange in color and curious in effect."

...wan in this diversity of opinions one does not detect the sincere glow of eulogy, and only a grudging respect for evident command of workmanship. But conductors like Ysaye, Winderstein and Mengelberg do not "take up" works without cause, neither do artists like Ysaye, Thibaud, Marteau, Casals, and especially Harold Bauer, play works which do not possess genuine artistic merit. At all events Moor must at least be commended for his patience and indomitable perseverance in the face of somewhat scanty encouragement; for his courageous productivity and adherence to artistic beliefs which are not in accordance with the spirit of the day. At all events the performance of his concerto, with Mr. B... in the solo part, will be awaited with no little curiosity and interest.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

D'Indy's "A Summer Day on the Mountain" to Be Played for the First Time Next Week, and a Forgotten Symphony by Schubert to Be Revived—A Student's Tone-Poem for the Final Cambridge Concert

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra are to play d'Indy's tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," for the first times here. It is at least two years since the piece was originally performed in Paris, and last winter both Mr. Damrosch in New York and Mr. Stock in Chicago put it on their programmes. When it was played in Chicago a long account of it was printed in this place, with the verses by the Provencal poet, de Pampelune, that suggested the pictures and the moods that Mr. d'Indy has woven into his music. He divides the tone-poem in three parts—the long crescendo of the dawn; afternoon, as the dreamer feels its brightness and heat and hears the distant sounds of the life of the valley as he lies outstretched under the great trees of the mountain; and last the fading day and the calm coming of the night. The music in matter and in manner is of Mr. d'Indy, austere, resourceful, and contemplative nativity. The tone-poem is a notable and interesting piece itself; and, its intrinsic merits aside, the distinction of Mr. d'Indy among French composers and among the composers in general of our time and the peculiar prestige he has enjoyed in Boston since he visited us in 1905, doubly warrant the performance of it. With Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem is to go an early symphony by Schubert that has not been played here within recollection. It is the fifth in the ordinary cataloguing of his symphonies; the key signature is B-flat; it was written in 1816; and it long lay unpublished. It runs in an allegro, an andante, a minuet and trio and a finale. The symphony is "full of Mozart," according to the all-knowing Grove; "and is as gay and untrammelled as all Schubert's orchestral music of that day." Curiously, he uses neither trumpets or drums in it. Another new piece that Dr. Muck will put on his programme in Cambridge for April 23 is a distinct innovation in the customs of the Symphony Concerts. Mr. A. T. Davison will take his doctor's degree next summer at Harvard. As his thesis, which academic rule requires for such a degree, has written a tone-poem, "Hero and Leander," after the old Greek legend, and Dr. Muck has undertaken to perform it, which is rare good fortune for Mr. ...

Here in Boston

It is definitely settled that Willy Hess is to return next autumn to his former post of concert-master in the Symphony Orchestra from which he was released last spring for a leave of absence of a year. There is, moreover, an explicit understanding that Mr. Hess's first concern shall be his regular work in the orchestra, and that he must keep his rehearsals and concerts with the projected Hess-Schroeder Quartet, his teaching and all his private engagements subordinate to it. With all Mr. Hess's ability and experience as a concert master, the drawback to his work here in previous years has been his preoccupation with other ventures and concerns that necessitated frequent absences or brought him back tired to the rehearsals and the concerts of the orchestra. The new arrangement presumably holds Mr. Hess strictly to his duties in the orchestra. But how will this requirement affect the fortunes of the new quartet that, according to the original statement of its plans, was to give concerts in many cities besides Boston? At least Mr. Schroeder has no intention to rejoin the S... Orchestra.

HERALD—FRIDAY, APRIL 17, 1908.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY.

Orchestra Volunteers for Benefit Performance April 27.

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra have offered their services for a concert to be given for the benefit of the Chelsea fire fund, and this will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, April 27.

It is a curious fact that on Sunday evening, April 29, 1906, the orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Gericke, gave a very successful concert for the benefit of the San Francisco relief fund, and $2500 was realized and turned over to the proper authorities. This year, with the disaster nearer home, it is expected that even more money can be realized for such a cause.

Harold Bauer, the pianist, has volunteered his services as soloist for this concert, as Mme. Samaroff volunteered hers two years ago, and Dr. Muck has entered into the project with much enthusiasm.

The scale of prices will be 50 cents, $1 and $1.50, and the seats will go on sale tomorrow morning at Symphony Hall.

GLOBE—FRIDAY, APRIL 17

SYMPHONY VOLUNTEERS.

Concert Will Be Given by Boston Orchestra for Chelsea Fire Fund April 27.

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra have offered their services for a concert to be given for the benefit of the Chelsea fire fund, and this concert will be given in Symphony hall Monday evening, April 27, at 8:15 o'clock.

It is a curious fact that on Sunday evening, April 29, 1906, the orchestra, under the leadership of Mr Gericke, gave a very successful concert for the benefit of the San Francisco relief fund, and the sum of $2500 was realized and turned over to the proper authorities. This year, with the disaster nearer home, it is expected that even more money can be realized for such a cause.

Mr Harold Bauer, the pianist, has volunteered his services as soloist for this concert, as Mme Samaroff volunteered hers two years ago, and Dr Muck has entered into the project with much enthusiasm.

The scale of prices will be 50 cents, $1 and $1.50, and the seats will go on sale Saturday morning at Symphony hall. The program will be announced within a day or two.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Program Comprised Two New Pieces, with Harold Bauer as Solo Pianist in Moor's Concerto.

On account of today being Good Friday this week's Symphony rehearsal took place yesterday afternoon, with two novelties included in the four selections. Paul Ertel's symphonic poem, "The Midnight Review," and Emanuel Moor's piano concerto were the new pieces, Harold Bauer being the soloist. Beethoven's first symphony opened the program, D'Albert's overture, "The Improvisatore," was played for a finale.

Dr Muck, who led three numbers with his left hand, was relieved by Mr Wendling in the concerto, and from an inconspicuous seat near the double bass Paderewski was an interested auditor.

Moor's piano concerto, coming after Ertel's strenuous and phantom-like "poem," probably lost some of its effectiveness, for despite the evident interpretative skill displayed by Mr Bauer, the first part of the work seemed to be vague and monotonous in matter and arrangement, leading up to more brilliant episodes, principally given to the soloist.

And these were ephemeral in character, for there was a constant variation in rhythm and key which the soloist and orchestra, thanks to their abilities, set forth with commendable unanimity of purpose under the guidance of Mr Wendling.

"The Midnight Review" illustrates a phantom parade of troops who followed the fortunes of Bonaparte. The subject is treated in a vividly impressive manner by Ertel who, in dissonant measures galore for brasses and instruments of percussion, suggests cleverly a weird processional, closing with an ingenious working up of the "Marseillaise" by the different choirs of the orchestra.

The review, which was given with all needful vehemence and military precision, proved to be an interesting number. The Beethoven symphony really gave the most enjoyment of the afternoon, the performance being very fine indeed. And the gayety of the d'Albert overture was demonstrated in the happiest mood of the orchestra.

Next week there are but two works to be played, and both are new to Symphony patrons. The first is Schubert's "unknown" symphony in B minor; the second, Vincent d'Indy's latest work, "A Summer Day on the Mountain."

The New Music Review in its number for May prints this just praise of Dr. Muck's work in America in an article about the final concerts of the Symphony Orchestra last month in New York: "Music lovers in New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor with gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to possess. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston Orchestra, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection, he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit, and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. Those purposes are the purposes of the composer. A more catholic musician than he it would be hard to find, one who more completely identifies and merges his own individuality in what he is performing, or who, with such absolute disinterestedness, seeks to understand the composer's meaning, to bring it out and to let his intentions prevail. He does this with a zeal and a concentration of energy that are, for the time being, a burning conviction. The personal equation is strong in Dr. Muck, as it must be in any musician of power; but no piece of music that he is willing to play is worth less to him than everything he can accomplish for it by every means in his power. It is not a breach of trust to say that he has played in New York music for which he personally has no liking, or which he even detests. But to the audience his conducting has been the absolute expression of the composer's intentions, as far as the deepest study and the most impersonal point of view could ascertain them, and the highest skill and devoted labor with so responsive a body of players as those Dr. Muck has commanded could realize them."

[186]

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, APRIL 17, 1908

BEETHOVEN—AND OTHERS—AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Tone-Poem by Ertel and a New Concerto by Emanuel Moor—Mr. Gebhard at Milton and His Advance in His Work—The Symphony Orchestra to Give a Concert for the Chelsea Relief Fund—Stephen Phillips Dramatizes Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor"—A Summer Musical Piece for Boston—Mr. Moody's Second Play—A Telling Little Piece by Mr. Sutro

The classics, with Beethoven's first symphony, in C major, had their turn at the beginning of the Symphony Concert yesterday, and then came a longer inning for the moderns with d'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisatore," Emanuel Moor's new concerto for piano "with orchestral accompaniment," and Paul Ertel's new tone-poem, "The Midnight Review." One by one, in the course of his two years in Boston, Dr. Muck has conducted in the seven other symphonies by Beethoven that are possible in purely orchestral concerts. Only the first remained—very early and here and there rather tedious Beethoven, to which the conductor gave its true and sympathetic voice. The first movement for example, echoes Mozart and has its Haydn-like commonplaces; yet Dr. Muck found in it at least a hint of the thrilling solidity of Beethoven's later music, as though the sense of ordered power was already stirring faintly and unconsciously in the young composer. Siimlarly the conductor held the slow movement to the pretty song that the youthful Beethoven designed. The scherzo went with airy lightness and spontaneous elasticity in its instrumental play, and the delicacy with which the orchestra and the conductor spun the final rondo hid its slenderness. It is quite useless to try to make this first symphony of Beethoven sound important or imposing. It is youthful work, obedient to the musical precedent and custom of the time, and departing from it oftener by the qualities that were instinctive in this Beethoven of his twenties than by compelling force of design and purpose. It has its occasional graces of invention and its clear purity and simplicity of style (as orchestral and melodic style went in 1800) is good to hear. Yet it has its commonplaces as well as its pretty charm and pleasant vivacity. Perhaps, had any other name stood on the title page, and Beethoven had gone no farther, it would have slipped into the oblivion that hides so many other symphonies of its time. There is only to take it for what it is, and once more Dr. Muck's conducting in it was proof of his sensitive and discriminating acumen. He did not try to amplify, heat or sharpen it. He let its bare places go and come. He did not try to find emotion where there is only the zest of composition. He was content to let the prettiness of the matter and the purity of the manner speak brightly and fully for themselves. So played, early Beethoven gives its own pleasure apart from what the wise men call his "artistic evolution," with which, after all, an audience in a concert room is not much concerned.

Two of the moderns—d'Albert and Ertel—were fun to hear, and the third—Moor, with Mr. Bauer to play his concerto—provoked to more serious impressions. At last in Germany and Austria, with "Tiefland" going up and down the opera houses from Trieste to Bremen, audiences and reviewers are willing to admit that d'Albert can write an opera that is genuine music-drama. Seven years ago, when "The Improvisatore" was new, they were sure that he could write no more than the orchestral part of one. They liked his preludes, applauded his ballet music, praised the richness and variety of his instrumentation and were bored by all the rest. Thus, until he wrote "Tiefland," the tireless d'Albert's operas came and went, leaving only some orchestral fragment behind. The most lasting of these is the overture to "The Improvisatore." The opera was a melodrama of passion and intrigue in the Padua of the glowing Italy of the despots and the awakening arts. D'Albert conceived his overture, seemingly, as a "tone-picture" of the glow and bustle of the lusty life of the hour and flung it off at a heat of gay melody, snapping rhythms, bright instrumental coloring, and general orchestral tumult. It was, said one of the disdainful reviewers, the only touch of "improvisation" in the whole opera. It holds its fire against the years, and yesterday it danced and chattered and bustled—even sung—as gayly as ever.

D'Albert's inspiration was life as he fancied it in that throbbing Padua where every man had an art, a mistress, and a dagger. Ertel's inspiration is ghosts—the phantoms of Napoleon's soldiery rising from the sands of Acre to the fields of Waterloo, to be reviewed at midnight by their phantom emperor. Zedlitz made some indifferent verses about the scene, and besought Schubert to put them to music. The composer found little suggestion in them, and for nearly a century they have awaited the Paul Ertel who now writes music and about music in Berlin. He has set to the task with all the resources and all the freedom of an ultra-modern devising. The tone-poem begins as though the earth was cracking and opening and casting the phantom soldiers upward—a singularly vivid delineative stroke. Faintly rattle the phantom drumbeats, uncannily and creakingly stir the ghostly soldiers (what an instrumental resource is the xylophone)! Far in the east to Oriental melody and rhythm stir the soldiers of Egypt. Nearer at hand are the phantoms of the Grand Army of the Empire. The muted trumpets give their ghostly call; the dead hussars and dragoons answer in fantastic and fantasmal charge. The phantom army is gathered; again the earth heaves; and solemnly comes—the emperor, and as solemnly and weirdly the "midnight review" begins. But France and the glories of France, the glory of the revolution and the emperor and his wars may stir even in phantoms. No ghosts sing the swelling Marseillaise—fugato—with which Ertel almost ends. The hymn of battle mounts to its climax; there is sudden pause, the orchestra shivers; the gong strikes one; and the yawning earth takes emperor and soldiers to itself again. Imaginative and pictorial programme-music throughout, and surprisingly ingenious in the fashion in which Ertel makes his music vividly serve his delineative purpose, and yet keep formal and symphonic.

Emanuel Moor's concerto is short and undivided; in spite of its title it often subordinates the piano to the orchestra; and throughout it stops at no exaction upon the technical address and resources of the pianist to gain its expressive ends. By so much it is in the modern rather than the classic vein. Its melodic ideas are many; often they are individual and once and again they quickly and keenly stir the listening imagination. Mr. Moor treats them in the freest of modern fashion, but usually he is very short-breathed with them. The musical idea stirs in him; a dozen variants of it seem to spring to his imagination; he catches at one, at another, at a third and straightway he is off to a fourth. Sustained progress seems impossible to him; he is all rhapsodic impulses, leaping or laboring to momentary expression. The concerto begins heavily, almost thickly, a little crabbedly. Soon the piano asserts itself against the orchestral mass; the music brightens in mood and color and turns warm with fitful energy. The orchestral timbres are vividly contrasted and combined; the piano has a clear and interesting musical speech with or against them. There is freedom of form, harmony and progression. There is sedulous avoidance of the hackneyed cadence, the traditional musical paragraph. Instead are flowing lines, incisive and emphatic accent, broken utterence and passing suggestions. The music sounds as of no school and of no man but Moor. It is wholly individual and bitter sometimes in its tang to the ear. Come climax and transition and piano and orchestra enter a slow section of mournful and fitful song, shifting through shadowy tonalities and clouded instrumentation, advancing, receding, rhapsodic throughout, yet with a distinctly sombre and meditative beauty of its own—a beauty that is still a little acrid and crabbed and a large rather than a detailed beauty. Inventive felicity in small things is not seemingly in the Moor of the concerto. He seems in this slow movement deliberately austere of speech, preoccupied with a large and rather brusque mood that yet speaks deeply out of deep feeling. The song mounts in sombre musing or shivers into fragments of itself. There is rather an excess of fitful climax, until at last the music swings into the sober rhythmic animation, flashing momentarily into nervous and rhapsodic brilliance, of the finale. Throughout it is curiously interesting and "different" music—the music of a man who has resolved austerely to express his own sombre self and no other; yet who cannot quite bring that self to expression, and must now run into over-emphasis; then take refuge in a crabbed reticence, an at last in moments of freedom, as here and there in the piano arabesques of the beginning or in the shadowy gleams of beauty in the slow section, find at last the liberty and the emotion that he would gain and express. But the struggle has made the music of even such release bitter.

H. T. P.

A Concert for Chelsea by the Symphony Orchestra

Following the precedent of the past, the Symphony Orchestra will give an extra concert for the profit of the Chelsea Relief Fund. When the news of the earthquake at San Francisco came almost exactly two years ago, the members of the band promptly arranged a concert that yielded $2500 for the succor of the city. They gave their own services; Mr. Gericke conducted as willingly, and Mme. Samaroff volunteered as the pianist of the occasion. The owners of Symphony Hall were as generous; an appreciative public filled every place in the house; and practically the full receipts of the concerts passed to the relief fund. Now, with the disaster and the need nearer home, the orchestra, of its motion and with instinctive regard for its position as one of the institutions of the city, has arranged a similar concert. Dr. Muck has readily promised to conduct and entered heartily into the project, though his work at the end of the season is by no means light. Mr. Bauer, the pianist, though he, too, is at the end of months of travel and recitals, has proffered his services, and he will be the soloist of the concert. Accordingly, it will take place on the evening of Monday, April 27, in Symphony Hall, with a comparatively light programme of familiar pieces. The tickets, at the moderate prices of fifty cents, $1 and $1.50, will go on sale tomorrow (Saturday) morning at Symphony Hall; and the concert will be almost wholly free from expense, so that the proceeds will go to the Relief Fund and nowhere else. There remains the public response, and by every sign of the past it will be generous. Dr. Muck and Mr. Bauer and many a man in the Symphony Orchestra are only incidental and passing Bostonians. Its citizens are in honor bound to be as generous as they, who give their work that the audience may have its pleasure.

...PITTSBURG BULLETIN...

...ress ...

...e ...

Willy Hess, for three years concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but who has the past year been abroad on a leave of absence, will return to his old post next season. Carl Wendling, who has been taking Mr. Hess's place in the Boston Orchestra, is to resume his position as concertmaster at the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart.

...DAY

...1908

...SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

...the Symphony rehearsal was ...earlier than usual on account of ...Good Friday today the crowd ...as large as usual. Among those ...ent were Mr. and Mrs. Wallace ...ich, Mrs. William Endicott, Jr., ...Frederick C. Shattuck, Mrs. Arthur ...or Cary, Mrs. J. G. Thorp, Mrs. ...am P. Fay, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, ...Alfred H. Hersey, Mrs. B. F. Pit...en, Mrs. Samuel Mixter, Mrs. Charles ...d, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Jr., Mrs. ...Shannon Davis, the Misses Green, ...Stanley McCormick, Mrs. R. G. ...Shaw, Mrs. Abby Linnell, Mrs. John ...evlin, Mrs. George W. Armstrong, Mrs. ...A. Barbey, Mrs. H. D. Forbes, Mrs. ...bard Hanlen Jones, Mrs. W. E. Dex...er, Miss Alice Longfellow, Mrs. L. C. ...mo, Miss Belle Hunt, Mrs. Nathan ...Matthews, Dana Estes, Mrs. James ...Jackson, Jr., Mrs. Frederick P. Vinton, Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. George Cushing and Mrs. John L. Gard...

...RCERT CONCERT APRIL 27.

The members of the Boston Symphony ...rchestra have offered their services for a ...ncert to be given for the benefit of the ...lsea Fire Fund, and this concert will ...ven in Symphony Hall on April 27. ...April 29, 1906, the orchestra gave a very ...ccessful concert for the benefit of the ...San Francisco Relief Fund, and $2500 was ...alized and turned over to the proper ...uthorities. It is expected that even more ...money can be realized this year. ...Mr. Harold Bauer, the pianist, has volun...services at a ...

...JOURNAL—SATURDAY,

...APRIL 18, 1908.

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck has placed but two works on the twenty-third program of the Symphony concert, which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and both of them are new to the Symphony patrons. The first is Vincent d'Indy's latest work, which is entitled "A Summer Day on the Mountain," written for piano and orchestra. The second work will be an unknown Symphony by Schubert, in B minor, No. 5, according to Breitkopf & Hartel's catalogue.

For his final program, which is to be played on May 1 and 2, Dr. Muck has chosen the same works which he played at his first appearance here, on Oct. 12, 1906: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; "A Faust Overture," "A Siegfried Idyl," and the "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO GIVE BENEFIT CONCERT

The entire ninety-eight men of the Symphony Orchestra have voluntarily tendered their services for a concert for the benefit of the Chelsea sufferers. This concert is to be given in Symphony Hall on the evening of April 27, and will be conducted by Dr. Carl Muck. The soloist of the evening will be Harold Bauer. Extra opportunities to hear the Symphony Orchestra are always appreciated by the Boston music lovers, and already applications for tickets to this benefit performance are pouring in on the management.

The last Symphony concert of the season in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theater next Thursday evening, April 23, at 8 o'clock. This will also be Dr. Muck's farewell, and in making his program he has paid a very pretty compliment to Harvard University. The first number on the program is an overture entitled "Hero and Leander," by A. T. Davison of Dorchester. Mr. Davison graduated with high honors from the musical department of the university two years ago, and since then he has been a graduate student there, working for his degree of doctor of philosophy. This overture, on which he has been at work for the past year or so, is a part of his thesis for his degree. The second number on the program will be Mozart's Concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, which Carl Wendling will play, and the last work will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

Professor Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theater in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

CABLE ADDRESS, "EIKE" NEW YORK

AMERICAN NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

NORTH

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

...ess

APR 19 1908

...pianist Paderewski plays for the last ...ime on his present tour at the Plaza Ho...el, New York, on Saturday afternoon, ...May 2. His first concert was given in ...Bridgeport, Conn., on Monday evening, ...October 28. At the end of his tour he will ...have played ninety-two times in sixty-...eight cities. In visiting these sixty-eight ...cities he will have traveled over 17,000 ...miles. About 13,000 miles of this distance ...he has traveled in his own private car.

...Professor Willy Hess, for three years ...concert master of the Boston Symphony ...Orchestra, who has been abroad during ...the last year on a leave of absence, re...turns to his old post next fall. Carl ...Wendling, who has been in Boston as ...concert master for the past year on leave ...of absence from the Royal Theater in ...Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end ...of the present season.

...Corinne Rider Kelsey, soprano; Edward ...Johnson, tenor, and Henri G. Scott, basso, ...to be soloists in the Choral Society's ...singing of Haydn's "Creation," on ...

MR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES

EXPLANATION, COMPARISON AND DEFENCE

No Innovation in the Number of New Pieces That He Has Put Upon Them—The Two-Fold Taste, Desires and Pleasures of the Public of the Symphony Concerts—The Necessity of New and Ultra-Modern Music at Them—The Fulness with Which Dr. Muck Has Done His Duty to the Classics—The Duty That He Has Equally Discharged to New and to Bold Pieces—The Peril of Stagnation in Routine—The More Generous Position of the Partisans of the New Music

Of the making of programmes for orchestral concerts there is no end, and debate and dispute over them are as endless. Fifteen months ago a part of the public of the Symphony Concerts was complaining that Dr. Muck was too conservative, and that he put too little ultra-modern and novel music on his programmes. Of late another part of that same public has been repining under the number of new pieces that have stood upon his lists. Fact and figure count for little when individual tastes and prejudices are in play; but the record, none the less, remains—that Dr. Muck in the two years which he has spent in Boston has held the numerical balance almost exactly even between the accepted classics, ancient and modern, and untried, neglected, or novel pieces. The aggrieved, again, have been fond of asserting that Dr. Muck has chosen far more new pieces than Mr. Gericke, for example, "ever dreamed" of picking. As a mere matter of count, Dr. Muck has performed forty-three compositions new to Boston in the past two seasons. In the last two years of Mr. Gericke's conductorship he performed thirty-eight or five less than Dr. Muck has ventured—a trifling discrepancy due probably as much to chance circumstance as to any deliberate "conservatism." Some of the more ill-tempered and presuming disputants—of the sort that have intruded their reproaches even into the privacy of Dr. Muck's life—have charged him with "cramming his new music down the throats of his audiences," because he happened to repeat in the same season Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Debussy's "Sea-Pieces" or Bischoff's striking symphony. Yet those quiet records note two performances of a new symphony by Mahler in the last year of Mr. Gericke's conductorship, and two of César Franck's symphony in the preceding season. (The custom, by the way, of the repetition of important new pieces is as old as Mr. Paur's time when he played Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony twice in a single winter). The truth is that unless the dispute starts from the premise that much more than half the music played at the Symphony Concerts in a single year should be familiar pieces, classic or modern, the advantage of facts and figures is clearly on Dr. Muck's side and on the side of those that uphold him.

Unfortunately, cool and comparative records have counted far less in the discussion of Dr. Muck's programmes than personal likings, prejudices and impressions. The extreme partisans of the older classics, even those who will go contentedly as far as Wagner or Tschaikovski—but no farther—cannot see how the rest of us can find keen pleasure and emotion in the hearing of Strauss or Reger, Debussy or d'Indy. Yet the fact remains that a considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts does find such pleasure frankly and honestly. The partisans of the old boast of their departures from the hall before some of these newer pieces (which they do not hesitate to judge by reputation if not by hearing) are played. Yet listeners have been known to forsake the concerts because they were weary of Haydn and found no detaining pleasure in Mozart. There are those who listen to Brahms as to obscure and rasping music as well as those who find Mr. Loeffler misty and irritating. All these moods are primarily individual idiosyncrasies or personal prejudices; but of the two factions the partisans of the moderns are much the more generous. If their opponents are to be taken at their somewhat vague and swelling words, they would gladly banish ultra-modern and new music altogether from the Symphony Concerts. The converse purpose has never entered the minds, it is safe to say, of the other side. They love the classics; they hear them gladly and with no less pleasure than they draw from the music of their own immediate time; they heed even the minor classics wherein the giants nodded; and they would not abate the place that established music has always had, and always will have, in the scheme of our concerts. Cheerfully they will agree that it is one of the chief duties of our orchestra and our conductors to keep the classics, elder and younger, steadily before the ears of their audiences in as perfect and life-giving performance as is possible. It is the other side that will not agree that the orchestra, its conductors and its public have an equal duty toward the music of their own generation.

What would we say of a public or a private library that excluded the newer books or the books that departed from accepted literary traditions? What should we think of readers who clamored that they should be so excluded or who reproached the librarian that had put them on his shelves? What would be our instinctive estimate of the literary breadth of view or curiosity of those who declined to open them? Suppose the picture galleries, that were not private possessions to gratify individual tastes, declined all the pictures of our own time; and suppose that visitors refused to look at such pictures or looked at them with disdainful eyes. Now, music is only one of the arts; it has the same privileges of nature and growth, innovation and ... the others. Once upon a time ... of George Meredith's novels ... strange and subtle in its kind ... idiom of the new ...

... are those in plenty to whom impressionist or characterizing pictures give no pleasure, which of course is a personal matter. Yet they do not contend that all such pictures should be packed away in the nearest cellar. Give them, however, the musical impressionism of Debussy or the musical characterization of Strauss, and they wonder resentfully why such pieces should be played. Most of us who read at all like to divide our reading between the old and the new. Most of us who look at pictures at all like to see both the old and the new. Why, then, in the ancient and honorable name of common-sense, should so many of us resent the mingling of the old and the new in the music that we hear, and particularly in the music of the Symphony Concerts?

The Symphony Orchestra exists to maintain and to foster the art of music, and its active and directing agent in such work is its conductor. From the beginning his discretion, and will have been absolute in the choice and arrangement of his programmes, and probably they always will be. It is the incumbent duty of any conductor to bring the elder classics to frequent performance. It is his duty no less to repeat the pieces that have established themselves in the last twenty-five years in the orchestral repertory until they have become the younger classics. Dr. Muck cannot be fairly charged with any undue neglect of either. They have made half, and more, of his programmes. He has, besides, brought them to the life-giving performance that renews their beauty and their strength. However much he has cultivated the moderns, he has spared no pains upon the classics. He has indeed brought Strauss and Debussy, Reger and Loeffler to memorable performance. But his performances of Beethoven and Mozart, of Brahms and Tschaikovski and Wagner, have been no whit less memorable. He has not set his classics, elder or younger, in cold-blooded array as though he were the keeper of some symphonic museum. He has made them alive with the qualities that have made them classics. They have spoken freshly and with true voice to their hearers. There is no just reason, as the record shows, to reproach Dr. Muck with neglect of the classics in the making of his programmes. There are twenty just reasons to praise the quality of his performance of them.

Happily the art of music goes onward. It did not stop with the great generation of the first half of the nineteenth century. It has not stopped with Wagner or Franck or Tschaikovski. It will not stop with Strauss and Reger, Debussy and d'Indy. It lives; therefore it grows. And it is as truly the incumbent duty of the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra to foster that life and encourage that growth as to keep the classics—whence both spring—warm and vital. The battle of the old and the new in music has been endless. Beethoven himself struggled for a hearing and recognition; Wagner was flouted as Strauss and Debussy have not been scorned; Franck's was for years an obscure name; Tschaikovski needed steady encouragement. How came they at last to win the place that they have gained? Because however strange their music sounded, however much it was resented, some one or other brought it to performance and brought along with it the new music of many another and lesser man. The conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is rich in such opportunity and independence. He may choose what and where he will; he has an orchestra capable of bringing new music, however difficult or strange, to authentic performance; he need not question whether new pieces "pay"; he has the prestige of one of the great positions in his profession. He is bound by his obligations to the art that he serves to bring new music to performance. He is no less bound by the resources at his command to apply them to the music of his own immediate time. His duty to his public bids him keep it informed of the progress of the art he cultivates and that it presumably seeks. In a hundred new compositions he may find no masterpiece. No more would the reader in a hundred books of the hour, or the connoisseur in as many contemporary paintings. Yet the reader does not stop reading, nor the connoisseur collecting.

Grant that many a new piece that Dr. Muck has played has not been notable. Grant that more have been interesting rather than striking. Grant that others have been innovating and ultra-modern. He can take only what the music of the moment yields and casts in its own fashion. It is not his concern as a conductor to discourage tendencies or to reject what one or another taste deplores. He is in honor bound, by all his obligations, to be catholic and to bring every sort of music that he has chosen to the most understanding, vivid and sympathetic performance within his power. Dr. Muck has been catholic in his choice, and having chosen he has wrought to his utmost in performance. No conductor of the orchestra has been more open-minded to American composers. None has been more diligent and wide-ranging in his scrutiny of European music. Dr. Muck has kept us apace with Debussy and d'Indy; he has brought us the music of the Far North; he has made us acquainted with the younger Germans; he has hunted out neglected composers. In a word, he has done his duty no less fully to the ultra-moderns than to the classics. More, or less, a man of his artistic honor and devotion could not do. He has done all this, moreover, when time and again this new music has been keenly distasteful to him as an individual; when he has resented its matter and its manner and distrusted its tendencies; when he would, twentyfold have preferred the classics that he personally cherishes. But Dr. Muck is a man of conscience and artistic probity. He has chosen to do his duty to the art he serves and to the place that he fills. Yet he has been spared neither complaint nor reproach.

It is Dr. Muck's catholicity of mind and loyalty to his art that the opponents of new ... music sorely need. ...

... week by week their pro...

They like to hear—what t... to hear, and they are resentful of s... else. It is a narrow and a selfish view. It would hold the Symphony Concerts to a circle of classics, old and new, and to imitations of them, whereas they should and do range widely. It would draw them apart from the music of our time, whereas they should be and are a mirror of it, no less than of that of other epochs; it would fasten them in the routine that kills vitality, whereas they should be and are quick with life and growth. The Symphony Concerts are an institution as well as a pleasure. There is no juster reason to ask them to stand still than to ask Harvard College not to widen its courses to meet the knowledge of the time, or to bid the Athenæum stop the buying of new books. The concerts, like the college or the library, must go on with the arts that they serve, and forbidding Pattingtons, either from conviction or from pique, are not impressive figures. More, there are two sides to this question of pleasure and of tendencies. A considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts, by the testimony of its presence, its interest, its applause and its subsequent talk of what it has heard, does find pleasure in new and ultra-modern music, does welcome the voice of its own time and stir to the new freedom, power, beauty and resource it is gaining. That public welcomes the new tendencies and follows them eagerly, and it is a public that has often made the most sacrifices to buy its places at the concerts. Another part of the public is curious about this new music and is beginning to yield to its appeal. Yet another, whatever its personal likings, would have the concerts as an institution keep their catholicity and vitality. All these groups have their right to the pleasure that they seek and to the respect that the conductor should pay them no less than do the exclusive partisans of the classics. It is the duty of the conductor to meet both wings of his audience in his programmes, and it is precisely this duty that Dr. Muck in all impartiality and sincerity has fulfielled.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Dying Season Stirs Again—A New Tone-Poem by d'Indy at the Symphony Concerts—"Samson and Delilah" by the Handel and Haydn Society—A Notable Concert by Mr. Czerwonky and His Quartet—Mme. Samaroff's Last Recital Here for Eighteen Months—Other Announcements

Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," will be played for the first times here at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall—the last new music of the year. Mr. d'Indy wrote the piece in 1905; it was first performed in Paris; and already in America Mr. Damrosch's orchestra in New York and Mr. Stock's in Chicago have played it. The tone-poem is scored for full modern orchestra with a piano added, and with all Mr. d'Indy's richness of instrumental coloring and elaboration of detail. He divides it into three parts: "The Dawn," a long crescendo of awakening light and life; "The Day," in which, seemingly, the tone-poet lies in the brightness and the heat of the afternoon under the great trees of the mountain side and hears the changeful and distant sounds of the valley and its folk below; and "The Evening"—a long diminuendo of fading light and stealing calm. According to the fly-leaf, the rhythmic prose of Roger de Pampelonne in "The Hours of the Mountain" stirred Mr. d'Indy to the writing of the piece. The deeper inspiration may have been no less his beloved mountains of the Cévennes where he lives and works in the summer. The other number of the programme is a long neglected symphony by Schubert, numbered five in Breitkopf and Härtel's catalogue, and bright with the gayety and lightness of the time when Mozart was his symphonic model. If the length of Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem permits it, another piece will be added to the programme.

On Thursday evening, at eight o'clock, in Sanders Theatre, the Symphony Orchestra gives the last of its current series of concerts in Cambridge with a programme of unusual interest. The symphony is Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony in which Dr. Muck conducted so dramatically last year. One of Mozart's concertos for violin precedes it and they are seldom heard nowadays. In it Mr. Wendling, the concert-master of the orchestra, will play the solo part, and the music invites the continence and refinement of his style. The innovation of the concert is the performance from the composer's manuscript of an overture, "Hero and Leander," by Mr. A. T. Davison, a candidate for the doctor's degree in music this year at Harvard. For some years Mr. Davison has been a student of distinction in the musical department there; the overture is a part of the thesis that academic rule requires for the degree he seeks; and in compliment to the university and by rare good fortune for the young composer, Dr. Muck has undertaken to perform it.

From .....

Address .....

...Professor ... for three ... concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Although the Symphony rehearsal was one day earlier than usual on account of its being Good Friday today the crowd was as large as usual. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. William Endicott, Jr., Mrs. Frederick C. Shattuck, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. J. G. Thorp, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. Alfred H. Hersey, Mrs. B. F. Pitman, Mrs. Samuel Mixter, Mrs. Charles Bird, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Jr., Mrs. L. Shannon Davis, the Misses Green, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mrs. R. G. Shaw, Mrs. Abby Linnell, Mrs. John Devlin, Mrs. George W. Armstrong, Mrs. J. A. Barbey, Mrs. H. D. Forbes, Mrs. Richard Hanlen Jones, Mrs. W. E. Dexter, Miss Alice Longfellow, Mrs. L. C. Fenno, Miss Belle Hunt, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Dana Estes, Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Mrs. Frederick P. Vinton, Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. George Cushing and Mrs. John L. Gardner.

BENEFIT CONCERT APRIL 27.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have offered their services for a concert to be given for the benefit of the Chelsea Fire Fund, and this concert will be given in Symphony Hall on April 27.

April 29, 1906, the orchestra gave a very successful concert for the benefit of the San Francisco Relief Fund, and $2500 was realized and turned over to the proper authorities. It is expected that even more money can be realized this year.

Mr. Harold Bauer, the pianist, has volunteered his services as soloist.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
APRIL 18, 1908.

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck has placed but two works on the twenty-third program of the Symphony concert, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and both of them are new to the Symphony patrons. The first is Vincent d'Indy's latest work, which is entitled "A Summer Dav on the Mountain," written for piano and orchestra. The second work will be an unknown Symphony by Schubert, in B minor, No. 5, according to Breitkopf & Hartel's catalogue.

For his final program, which is to be played on May 1 and 2, Dr. Muck has chosen the same works which he played at his first appearance here, on Oct. 12, 1906: Beethoven's Symphony in G minor; "A Faust Overture," "A Siegfried Idyl," and the "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO GIVE BENEFIT CONCERT

The entire ninety-eight men of the Symphony Orchestra have voluntarily tendered their services for a concert for the benefit of the Chelsea sufferers. This concert is to be given in Symphony Hall on the evening of April 27, and will be conducted by Dr. Carl Muck. The soloist of the evening will be Harold Bauer. Extra opportunities to hear the Symphony Orchestra are always appreciated by the Boston music lovers, and already applications for tickets to this benefit performance are pouring in on the management.

The last Symphony concert of the season in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theater next Thursday evening, April 23, at 8 o'clock. This will also be Dr. Muck's farewell, and in making his program he has paid a very pretty compliment to Harvard University. The first number on the program is an overture entitled "Hero and Leander," by A. T. Davison of Dorchester. Mr. Davison graduated with high honors from the musical department of the university two years ago, and since then he has been a graduate student there, working for his degree of doctor of philosophy. This overture, on which he has been at work for the last year or so, is a part of his thesis for his degree. The second number on the program will be Mozart's Concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, which Carl Wendling will play, and the last work will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

Professor Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theater in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

CABLE ADDRESS, EIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NORTH

...ess .....

Pianist Paderewski plays for the last time on his present tour at the Plaza Hotel, New York, on Saturday afternoon, May 2. His first concert was given in Bridgeport, Conn., on Monday evening, October 28. At the end of his tour he will have played ninety-two times in sixty-eight cities. In visiting these sixty-eight cities he will have traveled over 17,000 miles. About 13,000 miles of this distance he has traveled in his own private car.

Professor Willy Hess, for three years concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the last year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concertmaster for the last year on leave of absence from the Royal Theater in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

Corinne Rider Kelsey, soprano; Edward Johnson, tenor, and Henri G. Scott, basso, are to be soloists in the Choral Society's rendering of Haydn's "Creation," on April 20 next.

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES

EXPLANATION, COMPARISON AND DEFENCE

No Innovation in the Number of New Pieces That He Has Put Upon Them—The Two-Fold Taste, Desires and Pleasures of the Public of the Symphony Concerts—The Necessity of New and Ultra-Modern Music at Them—The Fulness with Which Dr. Muck Has Done His Duty to the Classics—The Duty That He Has Equally Discharged to New and to Bold Pieces—The Peril of Stagnation in Routine—The More Generous Position of the Partisans of the New Music

Of the making of programmes for orchestral concerts there is no end, and debate and dispute over them are as endless. Fifteen months ago a part of the public of the Symphony Concerts was complaining that Dr. Muck was too conservative, and that he put too little ultra-modern and novel music on his programmes. Of late another part of that same public has been repining under the number of new pieces that have stood upon his lists. Fact and figure count for little when individual tastes and prejudices are in play; but the record, none the less, remains—that Dr. Muck in the two years which he has spent in Boston has held the numerical balance almost exactly even between the accepted classics, ancient and modern, and untried, neglected, or novel pieces. The aggrieved, again, have been fond of asserting that Dr. Muck has chosen far more new pieces than Mr. Gericke, for example, "ever dreamed" of picking. As a mere matter of count, Dr. Muck has performed forty-three compositions new to Boston in the past two seasons. In the last two years of Mr. Gericke's conductorship he performed thirty-eight or five less than Dr. Muck has ventured—a trifling discrepancy due probably as much to chance circumstance as to any deliberate "conservatism." Some of the more ill-tempered and presuming disputants—of the sort that have intruded their reproaches even into the privacy of Dr. Muck's life—have charged him with "cramming his new music down the throats of his audiences," because he happened to repeat in the same season Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Debussy's "Sea-Pieces" or Bischoff's striking symphony. Yet those quiet records note two performances of a new symphony by Mahler in the last year of Mr. Gericke's conductorship, and two of César Franck's symphony in the preceding season. (The custom, by the way, of the repetition of important new pieces is as old as Mr. Paur's time when he played Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony twice in a single winter). The truth is that unless the dispute starts from the premise that much more than half the music played at the Symphony Concerts in a single year should be familiar pieces, classic or modern, the advantage of facts and figures is clearly on Dr. Muck's side and on the side of those that uphold him.

Unfortunately, cool and comparative records have counted far less in the discussion of Dr. Muck's programmes than personal likings, prejudices and impressions. The extreme partisans of the older classics, even those who will go contentedly as far as Wagner or Tschaikovski—but no farther—cannot see how the rest of us can find keen pleasure and emotion in the hearing of Strauss or Reger, Debussy or d'Indy. Yet the fact remains that a considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts does find such pleasure frankly and honestly. The partisans of the old boast of their departures from the hall before some of these newer pieces (which they do not hesitate to judge by reputation if not by hearing) are played. Yet listeners have been known to forsake the concerts because they were weary of Haydn and found no detaining pleasure in Mozart. There are those who listen to Brahms as to obscure and rasping music as well as those who find Mr. Loeffler misty and irritating. All these moods are primarily individual idiosyncrasies or personal prejudices; but of the two factions the partisans of the moderns are much the more generous. If their opponents are to be taken at their somewhat vague and swelling words, they would gladly banish ultra-modern and new music altogether from the Symphony Concerts. The converse purpose has never entered the minds, it is safe to say, of the other side. They love the classics; they hear them gladly and with no less pleasure than they draw from the music of their own immediate time; they heed even the minor classics wherein the giants nodded; and they would not abate the place that established music has always had, and always will have, in the scheme of our concerts. Cheerfully they will agree that it is one of the chief duties of our orchestra and our conductors to keep the classics, elder and younger, steadily before the ears of their audiences in as perfect and life-giving performance as is possible. It is the other side that will not agree that the orchestra, its conductors and its public have an equal duty toward the music of their own generation.

What would we say of a public or a private library that excluded the newer books or the books that departed from accepted literary traditions? What should we think of readers who clamored that they should be so excluded or who reproached the librarian that had put them on his shelves? What would be our instinctive estimate of the literary breadth of view or curiosity of those who declined to open them? Suppose the picture galleries, that were not private possessions to gratify individual tastes, declined all the pictures of our own time, and suppose that visitors refused to look at such pictures or looked at them with disdainful eyes. Now, music is only one of the arts; it has the same privilege to change and growth, innovation and variety as the others. Once upon a time the idiom of George Meredith's novels was as strange and subtle in its kind as the musical idiom of the new Frenchmen. Not so long ago the style of Henry James was as puzzling as that of Reger. Yet some of those who read Meredith gladly and James understandingly would crib and confine the sister are of music. There are those in plenty to whom impressionist or characterizing pictures give no pleasure, which of course is a personal matter. Yet they do not contend that all such pictures should be packed away in the nearest cellar. Give them, however, the musical impressionism of Debussy or the musical characterization of Strauss, and they wonder resentfully why such pieces should be played. Most of us who read at all like to divide our reading between the old and the new. Most of us who look at pictures at all like to see both the old and the new. Why, then in the ancient and honorable name of common-sense, should so many of us resent the mingling of the old and the new in the music that we hear, and particularly in the music of the Symphony Concerts?

Tae Symphony Orchestra exists to maintain and to foster the art of music, and its active and directing agent in such work is its conductor. From the beginning his discretion and will have been absolute in the choice and arrangement of his programmes, and probably they always will be. It is the incumbent duty of any conductor to bring the elder classics to frequent performance. It is his duty no less to repeat the pieces that have established themselves in the last twenty-five years in the orchestral repertory until they have become the younger classics. Dr. Muck cannot be fairly charged with any undue neglect of either. They have made half, and more, of his programmes. He has, besides, brought them to the life-giving performance that renews their beauty and their strength. However much he has cultivated the moderns, he has spared no pains upon the classics. He has indeed brought Strauss and Debussy, Reger and Loeffler to memorable performance. But his performances of Beethoven and Mozart, of Brahms and Tschaikovski and Wagner, have been no whit less memorable. He has not set his classics, elder or younger, in cold-blooded array as though he were the keeper of some symphonic museum. He has made them alive with the qualities that have made them classics. They have spoken freshly and with true voice to their hearers. There is no just reason, as the record shows, to reproach Dr. Muck with neglect of the classics in the making of his programmes. There are twenty just reasons to praise the quality of his performance of them.

Happily the art of music goes onward. It did not stop with the great generation of the first half of the nineteenth century. It has not stopped with Wagner or Franck or Tschaikovski. It will not stop with Strauss and Reger, Debussy and d'Indy. It lives; therefore it grows. And it is as truly the incumbent duty of the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra to foster that life and encourage that growth as to keep the classics—whence both spring—warm and vital. The battle of the old and the new in music has been endless. Beethoven himself struggled for a hearing and recognition; Wagner was flouted as Strauss and Debussy have not been scorned; Franck's was for years an obscure name; Tschaikovski needed steady encouragement. How came they at last to win the place that they have gained? Because however strange their music sounded, however much it was resented, some one or other brought it to performance and brought along with it the new music of many another and lesser man. The conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is rich in such opportunity and independence. He may choose what and where he will; he has an orchestra capable of bringing new music, however difficult or strange, to authentic performance; he need not question whether new pieces "pay"; he has the prestige of one of the great positions in his profession. He is bound by his obligations to the art that he serves to bring new music to performance. He is no less bound by the resources at his command to apply them to the music of his own immediate time. His duty to his public bids him keep it informed of the progress of the art he cultivates and that it presumably seeks. In a hundred new compositions he may find no masterpiece. No more would the reader in a hundred books of the hour, or the connoisseur in as many contemporary paintings. Yet the reader does not stop reading, nor the connoisseur collecting.

Grant that many a new piece that Dr. Muck has played has not been notable. Grant that more have been interesting rather than striking. Grant that others have been innovating and ultra-modern. He can take only what the music of the moment yields and casts in its own fashion. It is not his concern as a conductor to discourage tendencies or to reject what one or another taste deplores. He is in honor bound, by all his obligations, to be catholic and to bring every sort of music that he has chosen to the most understanding, vivid and sympathetic performance within his power. Dr. Muck has been catholic in his choice, and having chosen he has wrought to his utmost in performance. No conductor of the orchestra has been more open-minded to American composers. None has been more diligent and wide-ranging in his scrutiny of European music. Dr. Muck has kept us apace with Debussy and d'Indy; he has brought us the music of the Far North; he has made us acquainted with the younger Germans; he has hunted out neglected composers. In a word, he has done his duty no less fully to the ultra-moderns than to the classics. More, or less, a man of his artistic honor and devotion could not do. He has done all this, moreover, when time and again this new music has been keenly distasteful to him as an individual; when he has resented its matter and its manner and distrusted its tendencies; when he would, twentyfold have preferred the classics that he personally cherishes. But Dr. Muck is a man of conscience and artistic probity. He has chosen to do his duty to the art he serves and to the place that he fills. Yet he has been spared neither complaint nor reproach.

It is Dr. Muck's catholicity of mind and loyalty to his art that the opponents of new and of ultra-modern music sorely need. Too many of them have come to regard the Symphony Concerts as something that shall give them week by week their personal pleasure. They like to hear what they like to hear, and they are resentful of all else. It is a narrow and a selfish view. It would hold the Symphony Concerts to a circle of classics, old and new, and to imitations of them, whereas they should and do range widely. It would draw them apart from the music of our time, whereas they should be and are a mirror of it, no less than of that of other epochs; it would fasten them in the routine that kills vitality, whereas they should be and are quick with life and growth. The Symphony Concerts are an institution as well as a pleasure. There is no juster reason to ask them to stand still than to ask Harvard College not to widen its courses to meet the knowledge of the time, or to bid the Athenæum stop the buying of new books. The concerts, like the college or the library, must go on with the arts that they serve, and forbidding Partingtons, either from conviction or from pique, are not impressive figures. More: there are two sides to this question of pleasure and of tendencies. A considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts, by the testimony of its presence, its interest, its applause and its subsequent talk of what it has heard, does find pleasure in new and ultra-modern music, does welcome the voice of its own time and stir to the new freedom, power, beauty and resource it is gaining. That public welcomes the new tendencies and follows them eagerly, and it is a public that has often made the most sacrifices to buy its places at the concerts. Another part of the public is curious about this new music and is beginning to yield to its appeal. Yet another, whatever its personal likings, would have the concerts as an institution keep their catholicity and vitality. All these groups have their right to the pleasure that they seek and to the respect that the conductor should pay them no less than do the exclusive partisans of the classics. It is the duty of the conductor to meet both wings of his audience in his programmes, and it is precisely this duty that Dr. Muck in all impartiality and sincerity has fulfielled.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Dying Season Stirs Again—A New Tone-Poem by d'Indy at the Symphony Concerts—"Samson and Delilah" by the Handel and Haydn Society—A Notable Concert by Mr. Czerwonky and His Quartet—Mme. Samaroff's Last Recital Here for Eighteen Months—Other Announcements

Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," will be played for the first times here at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall—the last new music of the year. Mr. d'Indy wrote the piece in 1905; it was first performed in Paris; and already in America Mr. Damrosch's orchestra in New York and Mr. Stock's in Chicago have played it. The tone-poem is scored for full modern orchestra with a piano added, and with all Mr. d'Indy's richness of instrumental coloring and elaboration of detail. He divides it into three parts: "The Dawn," a long crescendo of awakening light and life; "The Day," in which, seemingly, the tone-poet lies in the brightness and the heat of the afternoon under the great trees of the mountain side and hears the changeful and distant sounds of the valley and its folk below; and "The Evening"—a long diminuendo of fading light and stealing calm. According to the fly-leaf, the rhythmic prose of Roger de Pampelonne in "The Hours of the Mountain" stirred Mr. d'Indy to the writing of the piece. The deeper inspiration may have been no less his beloved mountains of the Cévennes where he lives and works in the summer. The other number of the programme is a long neglected symphony by Schubert, numbered five in Breitkopf and Härtel's catalogue, and bright with the gayety and lightness of the time when Mozart was his symphonic model. If the length of Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem permits it, another piece will be added to the programme.

On Thursday evening, at eight o'clock, in Sanders Theatre, the Symphony Orchestra gives the last of its current series of concerts in Cambridge with a programme of unusual interest. The symphony is Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony in which Dr. Muck conducted so dramatically last year. One of Mozart's concertos for violin precedes it; and they are seldom heard nowadays. In it Mr. Wendling, the concert-master of the orchestra, will play the solo part, and the music invites the continence and refinement of his style. The innovation of the concert is the performance from the composer's manuscript of an overture, "Hero and Leander," by Mr. A. T. Davison, a candidate for the doctor's degree in music this year at Harvard. For some years Mr. Davison has been a student of distinction in the musical department there; the overture is a part of the thesis that academic rule requires for the degree he seeks; and in compliment to the university and by rare good fortune for the young composer, Dr. Muck has undertaken to perform it.

From .....

Address .....

—Professor Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year, on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre, in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—First Symphony.
Ertel—"The Midnight Review." Symphonic Poem.
Moor—Piano Concerto, Op. 57.
Pianist, Mr. Harold Bauer.
D'Albert—Overture to "The Improvisatore."

The long-deferred work by a composer named Beethoven was given at last, on Saturday. The audience were somewhat dazed at first by hearing melodies and were much amused by finding symmetrical form in the work. Poor old Beethoven seems to have some odd idea that Musical Art is connected in some way with beauty! We could discover nothing neurotic or morbid in the symphony, in fact the whole work was disgustingly healthy and normal.

Nevertheless there are a few points about the symphony that show the musical reformer. The composer threw down the gauntlet to the pedants in his very first measure, by beginning with a cadence in F major in a work in C. This dallying with key may be found in the beginning of his last symphony as well as his first. The use of the kettle-drums in the second movement was the first instance of the employment of this instrument as part of the melodic scheme. The bold Minuet was also an innovation on the pretty dance movement as established in symphony by Haydn. But the slow movement and the finale are definitely the work of the pupil of Haydn, and are in the 18th century vein.

The finale especially adopts that rollicking vein which the old writers held as essential to end a cycle form with. This jolly style of ending was a legacy from the Gigue which ended the Suite, and was apt to become as conventional as the smile on the face of a chorus girl. In his second symphony Beethoven began to feel his way towards a more dignified and powerful finale. But the Scherzo of his second symphony is not more of an innovation than this Minuet of his first—a Minuet only in name, a Scherzo in reality.

Dr. Muck (still using his left hand only) read the work with fine dash and virility. He spared no repeat and he did not "individualize" the work, but let the Beethoven ideas speak for themselves. The result was general enthusiasm at the end and two recalls. Finally the orchestra was allowed to rise in response to the ovation. Certainly the new school of composition has not dimmed the glories of the old. In Berlin at present they are having great revivals of "The Huguenots" and "The Masked Ball," which goes to show that even in Opera the old school has not been obliterated by the new.

In the last half of the programme the pendulum swung violently in the opposite direction and everything was modern, but of the left centre rather than of the extreme left. Ertel's ghost parads began with a March Macabre, after a midnight bell. St. Saens gave the bell to the harp, Ertel to the tamtam, which is more impressive. St. Saens gives a little of the knocking of bones upon the xylophone, Ertel goes into this skeleton effect at wholesale. There is also a very ugly passage on muted trumpets which sounds as if all the toy-makers of Nuremberg were rising from their graves. The piccolo shrieks with robust fervor through the most of the work. It takes a good deal of heavy scoring to get the old guard out of their comfortable tombs, but at last this is accomplished and they have a brilliant review in which the ghosts are far more solid than ordinary apparitions.

There are plenty of harp sweeps, (glissando) which become slightly monotonous after a while. Then the united forces sing the "Marseillaise," but few of these military ghosts know more than the first line, which they repeat over and over again, as is done in the leit motif of that less ambitious work called "Peggy from Paris." The imitative counter-point on this opening phrase is carried to a great length. Yet the work is exciting enough and is not too prolix save in its Marseillaise jugglings. It is on the whole a showy piece of programme music and it will bear repetition. At the height of the spectral orgie the clock strikes one and the fun is over.

The king of ghosts with forty thousand men,
Marched from their graves, and then marched back again.

Mr. Wendling guided the orchestra through the Moor Concerto. He led very well, as usual, but there was little to grasp in the work at a first hearing. It was rather a rhapsody than a set concerto, yet in its one continuous movement it was easy enough to discern the outlines of the regular three concerto movements, quick, slow and quick, but joined together by transition passages. There was a degree of melodic beauty in the work, but the ideas were rather rambling and heterogeneous, so that at the end one could ask, with the old French critic,—"Ce concerto, que me veut-il?"

But Mr. Bauer played the solo part with much enthusiasm and brilliancy. The piano was often used to embroider variations around an obbligato of this or that orchestral instrument. Thus there was a fine violoncello theme, a violin theme, a horn theme, each of which was treated in this manner. Often the piano gave what in another work might have been a cadenza, but here seemed merely improvisational. The finale had suggestions of dance themes and at last a good climax was worked-up with much blare of trombones. We cannot say with Shakespeare,—"I hate the Moor,"—but we wish his work were more sequential.

Of Mr. Bauer's playing one can speak only in praise. He is more than a mere technicist, he is a poetic and highly intellectual pianist. He was recalled twice, which was a sufficient triumph considering the vague and indefinite character of the work. It is possible that a study of the score might reveal more of a scheme than we discovered at this first hearing.

Now Dr. Muck returned and took charge of the orchestra in D'Albert's overture. It received a more brilliant interpretation than it has yet had in Boston. The work begins with much emphasis and has some degree of brightness. The crisp and dashing style in which it was given won a success for it. Again we found all the devices of the modern orchestra employed, including the same harp glissando effects that Napoleon's ghosts had used. One can easily overdo these siddings; the harp ... do much finer things, as Mr. Schu... often illustrated.

Lo...

22D CONCERT B... BOSTON SYMPH...

Two Pieces Given for First Time Here and Possibly in This Country.

HAROLD BAUER PLAYS NEW PIANO CONCERTO

Ertel's Panoramic "Midnight Review" and Beethoven's 1st Symphony Heard.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "The Midnight Review".....Ertel
Concerto in D flat major.....Moor
Overture to "The Improvisatore".....d'Albert

Two pieces were played last night for the first time in Boston and probably for the first time in this country: Paul Ertel's symphonic poem and Emanuel Moor's piano concerto in D flat major.

Ertel, who lives in Berlin, is a doctor of jurisprudence by title and a composer and music critic by profession. "The Nightly Review," the fifth of his symphonic poems, was played at Warsaw last February, and it has also been performed at Berlin.

The music is a translation into tones of Zedlitz's poem, in which Napoleon is represented as holding at midnight a ghostly review in the Champs Elysees of his soldiers who rise from their graves in the farthest north, in Italian clay, beneath the mud of the Nile and the Arabian sands. It is a literal translation, rather than a paraphrase, and to quote the slang of the painter's studio, the piece is frankly "a musing," from the Macabre opening, through the music that suggests the Orient, through the march with its old-fashioned pomp, through the strife between the "Dies Irae" and the "Marseillaise," to the clock that announces the hour of one and the dispersal of the valiant skeletons still ready to pay homage to the Little Corporal. The piece is orchestrally clever and picturesque, and yet there is more cleverness than imagination.

Emanuel Moor, a Hungarian by birth who lived in this country about 20 years ago, is a man of appearances, disappearances and reappearances. He married a Miss Burke, the daughter of the famous bottler of ale, and has thus been enabled to write much music at his leisure. Whether it would not have been as profitable for him to "tipple his ale in the shade" is a question for posterity to decide. Within the last three years virtuosos of indisputable talent, as Messrs. Ysaye, Thibaud, Marteau and Casal, have played concertos by him; symphonies have been brought out; and now Mr. Bauer, believing firmly in the concerto he played last night, must be added to the list of enthusiastic Moorites.

It is not easy to write fairly concerning this concerto after one hearing. Mr. Bauer gave an impressive performance of the piano part. He played with his customary intelligence—for Mr. Bauer is much more than a brilliant virtuoso and he thinks of other things than the mechanism of eight fingers and two thumbs—and with even more than his customary clearness in presentation, breadth of conception, tonal variety and amazing gusto. Yet the music left the hearer cold.

This music reminded one now of a Brahms that had gone wrong, and now of a Hungarian endeavoring to be pontifically thoughtful. The opening commands little attention; there are pages here and there that excite admiration by sporadic displays of meditative beauty or captivating capriciousness, but these pages are only too episodic; they throw into strong relief the serious lack of logical continuity.

The concert as a whole is subterranean and the pianist must often work as a mole, so that Hamlet's famous speech to the Ghost is here most applicable. The structure of the work is heavy, sombre, Egyptian. When there is melodic or harmonic beauty it is purely meditative, not sensuous; when there are hints at loftiness or grandeur of thought, no overpowering revelation follows. Page after page seems as contract labor. The admirers of Moor say that he is the one composer who never writes a note too much—a sweeping statement that can truly be said of few, if any. In spite of the devotion of Mr. Bauer, and Moor could wish for no better interpreter, in spite of the earnestness of Mr. Wendling, who conducted this concerto, the composition itself seemed as a whole labored, futile, uninteresting.

Dr. Muck conducted the purely orchestral pieces, but with his left arm, for he is still unable to use his right, and he was warmly applauded after the delightfully clear and sympathetic reading of Beethoven's symphony with its many echoes of Haydn and Mozart.

To say, as some do, that this symphony should not be played, because there is little of the true Beethoven in it, is foolish, for the music, in spite of pages of meer routine, still has a certain freshness and a quaint beauty.

The performance of it also serves a purpose; it reminds the hearer that when the symphony was played at Leipsic in 1801 many found the music confused, discordant, "outrageous effrontery"; that when it was performed the year before at Vienna there was complaint of an abuse of the wind instruments; that there were some who talked freely of the difficulty of performance and also of understanding. And so mature and honest hearers in Boston complain today of works by members of the "ultra modern" school and would fain hear only music that lulled them in their youth.

CONCERT FOR SUFFERERS.

The programme of the concert to be given on Monday night, the 27th, by the ... Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, ... assistance of Hes...

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 22nd rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was one of unusual interest. Two compositions by little known composers were given for the first time in this city, and these compositions were eminently "worth while." Mr. Harold Bauer was soloist. The list in full follows: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; "The Midnight Review," Symphonic poem for full orchestra, after poem of Ch. von Zedlitz, Op. 16, Jean Paul Ertel (first time); Pianoforte concerto with orchestral accompaniment, Emmanuel Moor, Op. 57 (first time); overture to the opera, "The Improvisator," D'Albert.

We are informed that Ertel was born at Posen in 1865; that he has made his mark in many directions, as a doctor of jurisprudence and lecturer on Roman law, as organist, pianist, composer, editor and music critic, a position which he holds at present. Ertel now lives in Berlin. As a composer he follows the tendencies of the modern school in writing music with poetic and symbolic subjects for its basis, and he has been an ardent musical experimenter.

It is not strange that a man of such disposition should be seized by the suggestion of von Zedlitz poem, a poem that deals with the imaginary resurrection, at midnight, of "The man with the little hat" and the review of his ghostly battalions.

The roll-call sounds.

So strangely rolls that drum,
So deep it echoes round,
Old soldiers in their graves
To life start at the sound.

The trumpeter blows his eerie summons. The squadrons gather, and "beneath their casque the skulls Smile grim; and proud their air":

O'er the vast plain the moon
A paly lustre threw;
The man with the little hat
The troop goes to review.
* * * *
That word they give is "France"!
The answer, "St. Helene"!

'Tis there, at midnight hour,
The grand review, they say,
Is by dead Cesar held
In the Champs Elysees!

This subject has interested many composers. Ertel follows freely the tale of the poem, and his music is not less fantastical and imaginative than the verses. A slow, treading rhythm is accentuated by the violins, playing "col legno," or with the back of the bow, a time-honored artifice intended to remind the fanciful listener of fleshless antics on the other side. These drum-beats were sufficiently awesome last night.

It is not possible, and it is not necessary, after a single hearing to describe this music in detail. It is enough to say that there is masterly workmanship and a potent imagination that give rise to music which is wonderfuly atmospheric, which grips the hearer and at once transports him to the unearthly scene. The trumpet calls are remarkably suggestive, and a striking moment comes when, over a long pedal-point, the "Marseillaise," treated contrapuntally, rises to a stirring climax, and comes when, according to the inscription in the score, the clock strikes one—a stroke on the gong and a pizzicato note of the double basses. We should hear more of the music of a composer of such unusual orginality.

Emanuel Moor, a Hungarian composer, born about 1862, is known but slightly to the American music public, though his compositions have been much played in Europe of late years, and he toured in this country in the years 1886 and 1887.

The concerto played yesterday has at first hearing two faults: a superabundance of good ideas, and too great length. It is in one movement and free in form, though there are sections which roughly speaking might correspond to the different movements of a symphonic work. The music is Hungarian in its contours and coloring, but it is a very individual expression, and the material is handled with striking originality. The piano is given an extremely difficult but component part in the composition.

The work should be at once heard again, for it is too rich to be thoroughly grasped or nearly appreciated after a single hearing. Mr. Bauer performed a herculean task with remarkable technical skill, musical authority and insight. He again demonstrated his right to be placed, not only among the few greatest pianists of this time, but among the still fewer musicians, who, forgetful of self, continually strive to heighten the artistic standard and bring before their audiences all that is worthy of performance. This concerto is a frightful task to the pianist, and the work makes no immediate bid for popularity. Mr. Bauer is a man of rare courage and initiative.

Dr. Muck conducted the Beethoven overture with perfect appreciation of the time and spirit in which it was written. His reading was beautifully simple, unaffected and unmodernized. Just what led to the placing of this symphony on the programme, however, might well be questioned. D'Albert's vivacious overture is one of the regular jolly German kind that is turned out in dozens each year by those who write light operas. It came as an agreeable and opportune diversion.

Dr. Muck has placed but two works on the 23d programme of the Symphony concert, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and both of them are new to the Symphony patrons. The first is Vincent d'Indy's latest work, which is entitled "A Summer Day on the Mountain," written for piano and orchestra. The second work will be Schubert's early Symphony, No. 5 in B minor, No. 5, according to Breitkopf and Hartel.

For the initial programme of May 1 and 2 Dr. Muck has chosen the same works that he conducted on the occasion of his first appearance in Boston, Oct. 12, 1906: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; "A Faust overture"; "A Siegfried Idyl," and the "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

From Daily Times,
Address Brooklyn, N.
Date APR 18 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is spoken of as a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Gorlicke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the work presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

Prof. Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Mr. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date APR 19 1908

Dr. Karl Muck ends his tenure of office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, May 2. In view of what he has done in the way of presenting new music to the patrons of the orchestra, it is rather amusing to remember the fears that were expressed in the early part of his first season, lest he be a pedantic conservative who held closely to the classics. In the forty-eight programmes he has made for Boston during the seasons of 1906-7 and 1907-8 he has presented forty-three works new to the Boston public, and twenty-four of these are played for the first time in America.

Prof. Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
APR 18 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, who will end his tenure of office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, May 2, has effectually dispelled the fears that were expressed during the early part of his first season, lest he be a pedantic conservative who held closely to the classics. In the forty-eight programmes he has made for Boston during the past seasons, Dr. Muck has presented forty-three works new to the Boston public, twenty-four of these being played for the first time in America.

188

ADVERTISER APRIL 20, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—First Symphony.
Ertel—"The Midnight Review." Symphonic Poem.
Moor—Piano Concerto, Op. 57.
Pianist, Mr. Harold Bauer.
D'Albert—Overture to "The Improvisator."

The long-deferred work by a composer named Beethoven was given at last, on Saturday. The audience were somewhat dazed at first by hearing melodies and were much amused by finding symmetrical form in the work. Poor old Beethoven seems to have some odd idea that Musical Art is connected in some way with beauty! We could discover nothing neurotic or morbid in the symphony, in fact the whole work was disgustingly healthy and normal.

Nevertheless there are a few points about the symphony that show the musical reformer. The composer threw down the gauntlet to the pedants in his very first measure, by beginning with a cadence in F major in a work in C. This dallying with key may be found in the beginning of his last symphony as well as his first. The use of the kettle-drums in the second movement was the first instance of the employment of this instrument as part of the melodic scheme. The bold Minuet was also an innovation on the pretty dance movement as established in symphony by Haydn. But the slow movement and the finale are definitely the work of the pupil of Haydn, and are in the 18th century vein.

The finale especially adopts that rollicking vein which the old writers held as essential to end a cycle form with. This jolly style of ending was a legacy from the Gigue which ended the Suite, and was apt to become as conventional as the smile on the face of a chorus girl. In his second symphony Beethoven began to feel his way towards a more dignified and powerful finale. But the Scherzo of his second symphony is not more of an innovation than this Minuet of his first—a Minuet only in name, a Scherzo in reality.

Dr. Muck (still using his left hand only) read the work with fine dash and virility. He spared no repeat and he did not "individualize" the work, but let the Beethoven ideas speak for themselves. The result was general enthusiasm at the end and two recalls. Finally the orchestra was allowed to rise in response to the ovation. Certainly the new school of composition has not dimmed the glories of the old. In Berlin at present they are having great revivals of "The Huguenots" and "The Masked Ball," which goes to show that even in Opera the old school has not been obliterated by the new.

In the last half of the programme the pendulum swung violently in the opposite direction and everything was modern, but of the left centre rather than of the extreme left. Ertel's ghost parade began with a March Macabre, after a midnight bell. St. Saens gave the bell to the harp, Ertel to the tamtam, which is more impressive. St. Saens gives a little of the knocking of bones upon the xylophone, Ertel goes into this skeleton effect at wholesale. There is also a very ugly passage on muted trumpets which sounds as if all the toy-makers of Nuremberg were rising from their graves. The piccolo shrieks with robust fervor through the most of the work. It takes a good deal of heavy scoring to get the old guard out of their comfortable tombs, but at last this is accomplished and they have a brilliant review in which the ghosts are far more solid than ordinary apparitions.

There are plenty of harp sweeps, (glissando) which become slightly monotonous after a while. Then the united forces sing the "Marseillaise," but few of these military ghosts know more than the first line, which they repeat over and over again, as is done in the leit motif of that less ambitious work called "Peggy from Paris." The imitative counter-point on this opening phrase is carried to a great length. Yet the work is exciting enough and is not too prolix save in its Marseillaise jugglings. It is on the whole a showy piece of programme music and it will bear repetition. At the height of the spectral orgie the clock strikes one and the fun is over.

The king of ghosts with forty thousand men,
Marched from their graves, and then marched back again.

Mr. Wendling guided the orchestra through the Moor Concerto. He led very well, as usual, but there was little to grasp in the work at a first hearing. It was rather a rhapsody than a set concerto, yet in its one continuous movement it was easy enough to discern the outlines of the regular three concerto movements, quick, slow and quick, but joined together by transition passages. There was a degree of melodic beauty in the work, but the ideas were rather rambling and heterogeneous, so that at the end one could ask, with the old French critic,—"Ce concerto, que me veut-il?"

But Mr. Bauer played the solo part with much enthusiasm and brilliancy. The piano was often used to embroider variations around an obbligato of this or that orchestral instrument. Thus there was a fine violoncello theme, a violin theme, a horn theme, each of which was treated in this manner. Often the piano gave what in another work might have been a cadenza, but here seemed merely improvisational. The finale had suggestions of dance themes and at last a good climax was worked-up with much blare of trombones. We cannot say with Shakespeare,—"I hate the Moor,"—but we wish his work were more sequential.

Of Mr. Bauer's playing one can speak only in praise. He is more than a mere technicist, he is a poetic and highly intellectual pianist. He was recalled twice, which was a sufficient triumph considering the vague and indefinite character of the work. It is possible that a study of the score might reveal more of a scheme than we discovered at this first hearing.

Now Dr. Muck returned and took charge of the orchestra in D'Albert's overture. It received a more brilliant interpretation than it has yet had in Boston. The work begins with much emphasis and has some degree of brightness. The crisp and dashing style in which it was given won a success for it. Again we found all the devices of the modern orchestra employed, including the same harp glissando effects that Napoleon's ghosts had used. One can easily overdo these slidings; the harp can do much finer things, as Mr. Schu[illegible] often illustrated.

Louis [illegible]elson.

HERALD APRIL [illegible]

22D CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two Pieces Given for First Time Here and Possibly in This Country.

HAROLD BAUER PLAYS NEW PIANO CONCERTO

Ertel's Panoramic "Midnight Review" and Beethoven's 1st Symphony Heard.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "The Midnight Review".....Ertel
Concerto in D flat major.....Moor
Overture to "The Improvisatore".....d'Albert

Two pieces were played last night for the first time in Boston and probably for the first time in this country: Paul Ertel's symphonic poem and Emanuel Moor's piano concerto in D flat major.

Ertel, who lives in Berlin, is a doctor of jurisprudence by title and a composer and music critic by profession. "The Nightly Review," the fifth of his symphonic poems, was played at Warsaw last February, and it has also been performed at Berlin.

The music is a translation into tones of Zedlitz's poem, in which Napoleon is represented as holding at midnight a ghostly review in the Champs Elysees of his soldiers who rise from their graves in the farthest north, in Italian clay, beneath the mud of the Nile and the Arabian sands. It is a literal translation, rather than a paraphrase, and to quote the slang of the painter's studio, the piece is frankly "a musing," from the Macabre opening, through the music that suggests the Orient, through the march with its old-fashioned pomp, through the strife between the "Dies Irae" and the "Marseillaise," to the clock that announces the hour of one and the dispersal of the valiant skeletons still ready to pay homage to the Little Corporal. The piece is orchestrally clever and picturesque, and yet there is more cleverness than imagination.

Emanuel Moor, a Hungarian by birth, who lived in this country about 20 years ago, is a man of appearances, disappearances and reappearances. He married a Miss Burke, the daughter of the famous bottler of ale, and has thus been enabled to write much music at his leisure. Whether it would not have been as profitable for him to "tipple his ale in the shade" is a question for posterity to decide. Within the last three years virtuosos of indisputable talent, as Messrs. Ysaye, Thibaud, Marteau and Casal, have played concertos by him; symphonies have been brought out, and now Mr. Bauer, believing firmly in the concerto he played last night, must be added to the list of enthusiastic Moorites.

It is not easy to write fairly concerning this concerto after one hearing. Mr. Bauer gave an impressive performance of the piano part. He played with his customary intelligence—for Mr. Bauer is much more than a brilliant virtuoso, and he thinks of other things than the mechanism of eight fingers and two thumbs—and with even more than his customary clearness in presentation, breadth of conception, tonal variety and amazing gusto. Yet the music left the hearer cold.

This music reminded one now of a Brahms that had gone wrong, and now of a Hungarian endeavoring to be pontifically thoughtful. The opening commands little attention; there are pages here and there that excite admiration by sporadic displays of meditative beauty or captivating capriciousness, but these pages are only too episodic; they throw into strong relief the serious lack of logical continuity.

The concert as a whole is subterranean and the pianist must often work as a mole, so that Hamlet's famous speech to the Ghost is here most applicable. The structure of the work is heavy, sombre, Egyptian. When there is melodic or harmonic beauty it is purely meditative, not sensuous; when there are hints at loftiness or grandeur of thought, no overpowering revelation follows. Page after page seems as contract labor. The admirers of Moor say that he is the one composer who never writes a note too much—a sweeping statement that can truly be said of few, if any. In spite of the devotion of Mr. Bauer, and Moor could wish for no better interpreter, in spite of the earnestness of Mr. Wendling, who conducted this concerto, the composition itself seemed as a whole labored, futile, uninteresting.

Dr. Muck conducted the purely orchestral pieces, but with his left arm, for he is still unable to use his right, and he was warmly applauded after the delightfully clear and sympathetic reading of Beethoven's symphony with its many echoes of Haydn and Mozart.

To say, as some do, that this symphony should not be played, because there is little of the true Beethoven in it, is foolish, for the music, in spite of pages of meer routine, still has a certain freshness and a quaint beauty.

The performance of it also serves a purpose; it reminds the hearer that when the symphony was played at Leipsic in 1801 many found the music confused, discordant, "outrageous effrontery"; that when it was performed the year before at Vienna there was complaint of an abuse of the wind instruments; that there were some who talked freely of the difficulty of performance and also of understanding. And so mature and honest hearers in Boston complain today of works by members of the "ultra modern" school and would fain hear only music that lulled them in their youth.

CONCERT FOR SUFFERERS.

The programme of the concert to be given on Monday night, the 27th, by the [illegible] Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, [illegible] with the assistance of Harold Bauer,

Overture "Leonore,"
Piano Concerto "Emperor,"
"Espana," Rhapsody for Orchestra,
[illegible]

POST APRIL 19 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 22nd rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was one of unusual interest. Two compositions by little known composers were given for the first time in this city, and these compositions were eminently "worth while." Mr. Harold Bauer was soloist. The list in full follows: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; "The Midnight Review," Symphonic poem for full orchestra, after poem of Ch. von Zedlitz, Op. 16, Jean Paul Ertel (first time); Pianoforte concerto with orchestral accompaniment, Emmanuel Moor, Op. 57 (first time); overture to the opera, "The Improvisator," D'Albert.

We are informed that Ertel was born at Posen in 1865; that he has made his mark in many directions, as a doctor of jurisprudence and lecturer on Roman law, as organist, pianist, composer, editor and music critic, a position which he holds at present. Ertel now lives in Berlin. As a composer he follows the tendencies of the modern school in writing music with poetic and symbolic subjects for its basis, and he has been an ardent musical experimenter.

It is not strange that a man of such disposition should be seized by the suggestion of von Zedlitz poem, a poem that deals with the imaginary resurrection, at midnight, of "The man with the little hat" and the review of his ghostly battalions.

The roll-call sounds.

So strangely rolls that drum,
So deep it echoes round,
Old soldiers in their graves
To life start at the sound.

The trumpeter blows his eerie summons. The squadrons gather, and "beneath their casque the skulls Smile grim; and proud their air":

O'er the vast plain the moon
A paly lustre threw;
The man with the little hat
The troop goes to review.
* * * * *
That word they give is "France"!
The answer, "St. Helene"!

'Tis there, at midnight hour,
The grand review, they say,
Is by dead Cesar held
In the Champs Elysees!

This subject has interested many composers. Ertel follows freely the tale of the poem, and his music is not less fantastical and imaginative than the verses. A slow, treading rhythm is accentuated by the violins, playing "col legno," or with the back of the bow, a time-honored artifice intended to remind the fanciful listener of fleshless antics on the other side. These drum-beats were sufficiently awesome last night.

It is not possible, and it is not necessary, after a single hearing to describe this music in detail. It is enough to say that there is masterly workmanship and a potent imagination that give rise to music which is wonderfuly atmospheric, which grips the hearer and at once transports him to the unearthly scene. The trumpet calls are remarkably suggestive, and a striking moment comes when, over a long pedal-point, the "Marseillaise," treated contrapuntally, rises to a stirring climax, and comes when, according to the inscription in the score, the clock strikes one—a stroke on the gong and a pizzicato note of the double basses. We should hear more of the music of a composer of such unusual orginality.

Emanuel Moor, a Hungarian composer, born about 1862, is known but slightly to the American music public, though his compositions have been much played in Europe of late years, and he toured in this country in the years 1886 and 1887.

The concerto played yesterday has at first hearing two faults: a superabundance of good ideas, and too great length. It is in one movement and free in form, though there are sections which roughly speaking might correspond to the different movements of a symphonic work. The music is Hungarian in its contours and coloring, but it is a very individual expression, and the material is handled with striking originality. The piano is given an extremely difficult but component part in the composition.

The work should be at once heard again, for it is too rich to be thoroughly grasped or nearly appreciated after a single hearing. Mr. Bauer performed a herculean task with remarkable technical skill, musical authority and insight. He again demonstrated his right to be placed, not only among the few greatest pianists of this time, but among the still fewer musicians, who, forgetful of self, continually strive to heighten the artistic standard and bring before their audiences all that is worthy of performance. This concerto is a frightful task to the pianist, and the work makes no immediate bid for popularity. Mr. Bauer is a man of rare courage and initiative.

Dr. Muck conducted the Beethoven overture with perfect appreciation of the time and spirit in which it was written. His reading was beautifully simple, unaffected and unmodernized. Just what led to the placing of this symphony on the programme, however, might well be questioned. D'Albert's vivacious overture is one of the regular jolly German kind that is turned out in dozens each year by those who write light operas. It came as an agreeable and opportune diversion.

Dr. Muck has placed but two works on the 23d programme of the Symphony concert, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and both of them are new to the Symphony patrons. The first is Vincent d'Indy's latest work, which is entitled "A Summer Day on the Mountain," written for piano and orchestra. The second work will be Schubert's early Symphony, No. 5 in B minor, No. 5, according to Breitkopf and Hartel.

For the initial programme of May 1 and 2 Dr. Muck has chosen the same works that he conducted on the occasion of his first appearance in Boston, Oct. 12, 1906: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; "A Faust overture"; "A Siegfried Idyl," and the "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nurenberg," by Wagner.

From Daily Times,
Address Brooklyn, N.
Date APR 18 1908

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is spoken of as a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedagogic or pedantic tendencies, and a review of his programmes for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past, he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times. It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel, who is better known in concert than in opera. Goricke came from the Vienna Opera House, with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipsig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programmes is not a simple task, even when a man has made a specialty of concert work. It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the work presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

Prof. Willy Ress, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Mr. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert-master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date APR 19 1908

Dr. Karl Muck ends his tenure of office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, May 2. In view of what he has done in the way of presenting new music to the patrons of the orchestra, it is rather amusing to remember the fears that were expressed in the early part of his first season, lest he be a pedantic conservative who held closely to the classics. In the forty-eight programmes he has made for Boston during the seasons of 1906-7 and 1907-8 he has presented forty-three works new to the Boston public, and twenty-four of these are played for the first time in America.

188

Prof. Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

BULLETIN,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

[illegible] Saturday evening, May 2.

Dr. Karl Muck, who will end his tenure of office as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, May 2, has effectually dispelled the fears that were expressed during the early part of his first season, lest he be a pedantic conservative who held closely to the classics. In the forty-eight programs he has made for Boston during the two past seasons, Dr. Muck has presented forty-three works new to the Boston public, twenty-four of these being played for the first time in America.

[188]

TIMES,

ess New York City.

APR 18 1908

HESS BACK AT OLD POST.

Concertmeister Again of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Willy Hess, after a season abroad, returns to his old post as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, replacing Carl Wendling. It is also announced that he will start a new quartet, to be known as the Hess-Schroeder Quartet, in which Alwin Schroeder, violinist, and Theodorowicz, violinist, both formerly of the Kneisel Quartet, will play. The viola player is not yet selected.

It is said, however, that there is an understanding that Mr. Hess's first concern shall be his regular work with the orchestra, and that he must subordinate his rehearsals and concerts with the projected Hess-Schroeder Quartet and his teaching and private engagements.

With all Mr. Hess's ability and experience as a concertmeister, the drawback to his work here in previous years has been his preoccupation with other ven-

COMMERCIAL,

ss New York City.

APR 20 1908

Immediately after the Chelsea conflagration last week, Harold Bauer, who happened to be playing with the Boston Symphony, offered his services for a benefit appearance. Simultaneously with Mr. Bauer's offer, Charles A. Ellis offered a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To combine these appearances Mr. Bauer and the orchestra will together give a benefit performance on April 27. The occasion will mark the last appearance of both the orchestra and Mr. Bauer in Boston this year.

From GERMAN HERALD

Address NEW YORK CITY.

Date APR 18 1908

— Willy Heß, der bekannte Violinist, wird wieder dem Bostoner Orchester beitreten, und zwar in seiner ehemaligen Eigenschaft als Concertmeister, an Stelle Carl Wendling's.

JOURNAL— APRIL 27. 1908

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date APR 20 1908

Immediately after the Chelsea conflagration last week, Harold Bauer, who happened to be playing with the Boston Symphony, offered his services for a benefit appearance. Simultaneously with Mr. Bauer's kindly offer Mr. Charles A. Ellis, also offered a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was deemed expedient to combine these appearances, and hence Mr. Bauer and the Orchestra will together give this benefit performance on April 27. In New York Mr. Bauer gives his final concert to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

HAROLD BAUER, ... PIANIST AT TONIG... SYMPHONY CONC...

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR BENEFIT OF CHELSEA

Dr. Muck Bids Farewell to General Public at Special Concert. Bauer the Soloist.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, will say farewell to the general public at the Chelsea relief fund concert at Symphony Hall tonight. This will be his last appearance here except when he says good-by to the regular Symphony audiences later in the week. Tonight's concert will also mark the last appearance here for some time of Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist, who has volunteered his services. He will be the soloist in the performance of Beethoven's "Emperer" concerto for piano and orchestra.

The full program will be as follows: Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, the "Emperor" concerto, Chabrier's "Spanish" rhapsody, and the popular "Tannhaeuser" overture. The performance of this last piece was one of the memorable features of the last pension fund concert given by the famous orchestra.

The concert tonight will be voluntary in every respect. Every one connected with it has offered his services free. So every dollar taken in will be turned over to the Chelsea relief authorities. It was just the same two years ago, when the orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's leadership, volunteered its services in behalf of the San Francisco sufferers.

SYMPHONIC PICTURE THE CHARM OF THE CONCERT

D'Indy's symphonic picture, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," was played for the first time at a Symphony concert on Saturday night. It was exquisitely played, too, and after the second movement there was great applause. Certainly in no other city in the country has the rationalistic music of the distinguished French composer received a more appreciative welcome than here in Boston. In this particular instance the reception was deserved, for this tonal description of a day spent on the mountain is vividly true and beautiful. Perhaps in no other composition has D'Indy given a more impressive exhibition of his talents and his ideas. If music is to be stripped of its time-honored euphony, then "A Summer Day on the Mountain" will serve as a perfect example of the new form.

By way of contrast there was also on the program Schubert's symphony in B flat major, which the orchestra had not played for twenty-five years; and, with its reminiscences of Mozart and Haydn, it presented a most pleasing souvenir of the old days, when everything was powdered and sugared. Schubert was only 19 when he wrote it, but genius develops early. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's stereotyped overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

This week's concert will be the last of the season. Dr. Muck will then make his farewell. The program will consist of Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner pieces, the "Faust" overture, "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date APR 18 1908

Henry Wolfsohn has received a large number of applications for seats for the series of chamber concerts to be given by the Hess-Schroeder quartet. Alwin Schroeder will sail from Genoa May 21, and, with his family, will go to Sorrento, Italy, where he will be joined by Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and J. Theodorowics, who will play the second violin in the new organization. Mr. Schroeder will also fill a number of engagements as soloist.

EVENING WORLD,

dress New York City.

te APR 18 1908

Willy Hess, who has been abroad for a year, will take his old place as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra next fall. Carl Wendling, who succeeded him, is going home to Stuttgart. Alvin Schroeder, who went to Germany to live a year ago, is also coming back to America. He finds the conditions of musical art more favorable here. He is to join Willy Hess and two others in a new chamber music quartet next season.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

dress APR 19 1908

— Professor Willy Heß, der frühere Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, kehrt mit nächster Saison an diesen Posten zurück. Der diesjährige Konzertmeister der berühmten Organisation, Herr Carl Wendling, welcher auf Grund eines einjährigen Urlaubs des Hoftheaters von Stuttgart hier weilte, kehrt wieder in seine frühere Stellung zurück. —

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

ess APR 18 1908

Prof. Willy Hess will return as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, from which post he took a leave of absence of a year. Mr. Wendling will return to the royal theatre in Stuttgart, whence he came to replace Mr.

[189]

THE TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1908

A Cambridge Concert

The public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston go not to the shorter series in Cambridge. Twenty-four concerts here from October even to May may reasonably suffice it; the programmes in Sanders Theatre usually repeat pieces that have already been played in Symphony Hall and that are oftener classic than new and strange; while the "soloists" of Cambridge are the minor incidents that theoretically they ought to be, though practically they are not, of the concerts in Boston. A smaller orchestra goes to Cambridge than that which weekly fills the stage of Symphony Hall, but the picked men of the band compose it, and its fifty or sixty players sound as no ninety may sound at home. As some say, who believe the acoustics of an auditorium are a happy—or an unhappy—accident, over-much science was applied to Symphony Hall with not altogether fortunate results. At the least, Sanders Theatre is an amphitheatre and not a long, rectangular tunnel. It has walls and a roof of wood and not of that "modern fireproof construction," which is better for safety, perhaps, than for sound. Above all, its smaller dimensions and its circular shape bring audience and orchestra into pleasant and unusual intimacy. Last Thursday, for example, Mr. Wendling happened to play a violin concerto by Mozart—music written for a small room and a small orchestra. In Symphony Hall, with the parts doubled and with all the accepted devices to make such music "sound," it would have seemed pale and thin. In Sanders Theatre it kept its brightness and crispness, its suavity and elegance. The little felicities of figure and ornament in the music came clear and warm to the ear; Mr. Wendling could play the violin part without a thought of forcing; and the accompanying orchestra could keep an agreeable lightness of tone. Most eighteenth century music sounds inflated and over-emphasized in Symphony Hall, and loses thereby something of its animation and transparency. In the finer acoustics and the closer intimacy of Sanders Theatre, it holds its true qualities and distinctions. Even as small an orchestra as Mozart or Haydn often used could play there persuasively.

And the moderns, the opulent, ardent, incisive and clamorous moderns, gain no less. Another "number" of the concert of Thursday happened to be Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony—music that would "sound" anywhere and that at every turn is familiar. None the less in the clearer and finer acoustics of the auditorium in Cambridge and in the closeness of band and listeners the ear and the imagination caught a score of details that hitherto had passed clouded or unheeded. What the textbooks call the inner voices of the instrumental ensemble were clearer. The melodies themselves stood out more sharply and warmly against the harmonic background. Passages of transition had a new aptness. The finer shadings of tone in the virtuosi of the band were more appreciable. In particular every dramatic stroke of the composer and the conductor told on the instant. Once in the regular concerts of last season and once in a Pension Fund concert of this year Dr. Muck has conducted in the "Pathetic" symphony, and there is little need to recall the dramatizing intensity of the performance. Symphonic music though it is, the dramatic quality is uppermost, and the whole is more truly an emotional and a spiritual tragedy in tones than many an avowed music-drama. It is theatrical music, too, music that "tells" with its hearers swiftly and surely. This dramatic, even this theatrical, quality Dr. Muck has emphasized, until he has been almost the operatic conductor again. And in the acoustics and the intimacy of Sanders Theatre he could fairly smite his audience with Tschaikovski's blows or catch them up into the course and passion of the tragedy in tones. Symphony Hall, it seems, may tame even a Russian.

Moreover, these Cambridge concerts have an atmosphere of their own. Here in Boston the Symphony Concerts come and go plentifully in the weekly routine of the musical year. In Cambridge they come at intervals of a month or of six weeks, and they have more the air of an event and even of festivity. The audience—of Cambridge in general rather than of the University in particular—is pleased with itself, with the occasion, with its momentary sense of proprietorship in the orchestra. The other night, at the end of the concert, it recalled Dr. Muck again and again, lingered for him, even waved handkerchiefs at him, quite as though he were departing for good and all and not going back to Boston for five more concerts. Perhaps, however, it was returning the second of the two compliments the conductor has paid it. Eighteen months ago, when Dr. Muck conducted for the first time in Cambridge, he put three symphonies on his programme. Some of his advisers took alarm. "Where should I play three symphonies, if not at a University?" answered the conductor, and by all accounts his audience enjoyed them. With his leave-taking he paid the University his second compliment—the performance of an overture that one of the students in its own department of music had written. No less than with the three symphonies, and as quietly, Dr. Muck waived custom and precedent, and young Mr. Davison heard his "Hero and Leander" at the hands of an orchestra and a conductor that established composers might have envied. With a classic symphony or a modern tone-poem Dr. Muck could not have taken more pains. He made Mr. Davison's sea-music "sound"; he heightened the tumult of his plausible orchestral storm and he set the broken song of the lovers clear against it. With still finer sympathy he slipped over the occasional redundancies of the music; the momentary laxities of form and clumsiness of means; and whenever the young composer had contrived an ingenious or imaginative instrumental stroke, the conductor made it clear and sure. The music "sounded" for itself—and it is the music of a student of talent who needs widening experience and keener self-criticism — and more, but Dr. Muck would have it that the applause was all for the piece and the composer, and not for the performance and

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Familiar Mendelssohn, Youthful ... and New and Mature D'Indy—His Tone Pictures of "A Summer Day on the Mountain" for the First Time—Music of Mood and Mystery, Emotion and Revery, with the Mountain to Prompt Them All —A Programme of Contrasts

Dr. Muck's programme at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon ran to ingenious contrasts. "Felix is writing a great instrumental piece, after Goethe," wrote Fanny Mendelssohn eighty years ago, "and he is going to bring together in it two pictures standing in contrast with each other." The "great instrumental piece" is the familiar overture of the glassy sea and then of the stirring wind and water that speed the ship to port. It began the concert on Friday, but it hardly seems so "great" or so pictorial nowadays as it did to the sisterly Fanny and many another admiring pen of the distant twenties. The art of "tone-picturing" has gone fast and far since those days, and for example of it in its present estate, Mr. d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain" ended the concert. Between these "pictures" stood one of Schubert's early symphonies—the symphony in B-flat "without trumpets or drums," and here were plenteous contrasts—Schubert's little band beside d'Indy's modern orchestra with even a piano added; Schubert's spontaneity beside Mendelssohn's nice precision and d'Indy's reflective and searching pains; Schubert's content with tonal pattern and instrumental song for their own sake and d'Indy's insistent effort for fuller and fuller emotional expression; Schubert's gay innocence, Mendelssohn's consciousness of himself and his effects; and d'Indy smitten with the introspection of our time. Schubert charmed and amused, and the listener cared not a penny how much he had remembered of his Mozart or his Haydn. At least he was enough himself to be gayer than they. Mendelssohn pleased with his water-color in tones. You can paint a water-color with spirit as well as nicety, and it is good in these days of ragged and impatient musical energy to see the means so adroitly fitted to the end. Mendelssohn after all, is the stylist of the "just" musical word. The listener may not be keenly interested in what he has to say, but how completely and surely he says it. The Mendelssohnian sea is certainly far away from Debussy's, but each has the plain mastery of his resources and the grasp upon his design that brings his purpose exactly to expression.

And Mr. d'Indy in turn in his three "Symphonic Pictures" writes with a large freedom that is good to feel again. In his second symphony the sheer magnitude of the design, the depth of the thought, the intensity of passion that the composer seemed to strive for an expression that even he could not bring to the fulness of his mood and ideal. In the "Souvenirs," written after the "tone-pictures" were finished, there is by report a touch of crabbedness as though the reticence of intimate emotions had a little stiffened the composer's hand. "Summer Day on the Mountain' is spacious, and elastic and eloquent. The score quotes fragments of a "prose poem" by Roger de Pampelonne as the suggestion and the inspiration of the music, but the deeper inspiration was D'Indy's own spirit, expanding and kindling under the spell of his beloved mountains of the Cévennes. There he has lain in the creeping dawn and the fading twilight, the beginning and the end of his day. There he has lain "under the pines" of the sub-title and let the distant sounds of the life of the valley break, and then pass again, his revery. There, above all else, he has gained what twenty "prose-poems" might not give the sense of the strength and the calm and mystery of mountains. He has translated the spell and wonder of them and the answering exaltation of spirit that they stir into tones. Somewhere in the music the birds of dawn twitter for an instant; somewhere toward the end there is the suggestion of the creepy shudder in the timid heart of a child as nightfall comes near the forest. These, and many another like them, are details wrought adroitly and imaginatively. The dreamer under the pines hears fitfully the merrymaking or the work of busy life in the distant valley and again the music is vivid with suggestion. But the deep, insistent and aspiring voice of it is the voice of the mountains themselves.

Orchestral dawns on sea, or land, ... valley or upon mountain have almost become a convention of music from the first flickerings of the strings and the winds to the coming light through the harmonies of the close, with its flood of sunshine. They suggest much or little according to the imagination and the ingenuity of the composer, but seldom the mystery and the thrill of the advancing light and of the newly created day. Mr. d'Indy is too sincere and self-centred to heed the conventions of orchestral dawns; he is no "realist" to try to make his music more minutely delineative and suggestive. He is a poet and idealist, and thus he has sought and translated into tones the thrill and the mystery of the awakening earth. At the beginning he has made sound suggest even a breathless, quivering, expectant silence. It is no less the silence of the man who looks and feels than the stillness of the mountain and valley awaiting the light. The thrill of the coming of the first rays; the fitful glow; the steadying, warming light, the slow fading and then the swift vanishing of the darkness are the music not as so many "descriptions" in tones, but as so many emotions that stir as the poet sees and feels with all his spirit in the solitude of his mountain. Then as swiftly comes the awakening life in the valley below and the mystery has fled. The world stirs again. Here is no place to discuss the means and methods by which Mr. d'Indy has translated these moods and visions into communicating tones. They are there for the student. The poet's heart is Mr. d'Indy is poet, though his ... music—head, ...

TIMES,

ess New York City.

R 8 1908

HESS BACK AT OLD POST.

Concertmeister Again of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Willy Hess, after a season abroad, returns to his old post as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, replacing Carl Wendling. It is also announced that he will start a new quartet, to be known as the Hess-Schroeder Quartet, in which Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, and Theodorowicz, violinist, both formerly of the Kneisel Quartet, will play. The viola player is not yet selected.

It is said, however, that there is an understanding that Mr. Hess's first concern shall be his regular work with the orchestra, and that he must subordinate his rehearsals and concerts with the projected Hess-Schroeder Quartet and his teaching and private engagements.

With all Mr. Hess's ability and experience as a concertmeister, the drawback to his work here in previous years has been his preoccupation with other ventures.

COMMERCIAL,

ss New York City.

R 20 1908

Immediately after the Chelsea conflagration last week, Harold Bauer, who happened to be playing with the Boston Symphony, offered his services for a benefit appearance. Simultaneously with Mr. Bauer's offer, Charles A. Ellis offered a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To combine these appearances Mr. Bauer and the orchestra will together give a benefit performance on April 27. The occasion will mark the last appearance of both the orchestra and Mr. Bauer in Boston this year.

From BOSTON

Address

Date

— Willy Heß, der bekannte Violinist, wird wieder dem Bostoner Orchester beitreten, und zwar in seiner ehemaligen Eigenschaft als Concertmeister, an Stelle Carl Wendling's.

JOURNAL— APRIL 27, 1908

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

APR 20 1908

Immediately after the Chelsea conflagration last week, Harold Bauer, who happened to be playing with the Boston Symphony, offered his services for a benefit appearance. Simultaneously with Mr. Bauer's kindly offer Mr. Charles A. Ellis also offered a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was deemed expedient to combine these appearances, and hence Mr. Bauer and the Orchestra will together give this benefit performance on April 27. In New York Mr. Bauer gives his final concert to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

HAROLD BAUER, [illegible]
PIANIST AT TONIG[illegible]
SYMPHONY CONC[illegible]

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

[illegible] 1908

Henry Wolfsohn has received a large number of applications for seats for the series of chamber concerts to be given by the Hess-Schroeder quartet. Alwin Schroeder will sail from Genoa May 21, and, with his family, will go to Sorrento, Me., where he will be joined by Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and J. Theodorowics, who will play the second violin in the new organization. Mr. Schroeder will also fill a number of engagements as soloist.

m EVENING WORLD,

lress New York City.

te

Willy Hess, who has been abroad for a year, will take his old place as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next fall. Carl Wendling, who succeeded him, is going home to Stuttgart. Alvin Schroeder, who went to Germany to live a year ago, is also coming back to America. He finds the conditions of musical art more favorable here. He is to join Willy Hess and two others in a new chamber music quartet next season.

abl 8.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

m

New York City.

lress

— Professor Willy Heß, der frühere Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, kehrt mit nächster Saison an diesen Posten zurück. Der diesjährige Konzertmeister der berühmten Organisation, Herr Carl Wendling, welcher auf Grund eines einjährigen Urlaubs des Hoftheaters von Stuttgart hier weilte, kehrt wieder in seine frühere Stellung zurück. —

EVENING MAIL,

n

ress New York City.

18 1908

Prof. Willy Hess will return as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, from which post he took a leave of absence of a year. Mr. Wendling will return to the Royal theatre in Stuttgart, from whence he came to replace Mr. Hess.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR BENEFIT OF CHELSEA

Dr. Muck Bids Farewell to General Public at Special Concert. Bauer the Soloist.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, will say farewell to the general public at the Chelsea relief fund concert at Symphony Hall tonight. This will be his last appearance here except when he says good-by to the regular Symphony audiences later in the week. Tonight's concert will also mark the last appearance here for some time of Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist, who has volunteered his services. He will be the soloist in the performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for piano and orchestra.

The full program will be as follows: Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, the "Emperor" concerto, Chabrier's "Spanish" rhapsody, and the popular "Tannhaeuser" overture. The performance of this last piece was one of the memorable features of the last pension fund concert given by the famous orchestra.

The concert tonight will be voluntary in every respect. Every one connected with it has offered his services free. So every dollar taken in will be turned over to the Chelsea relief authorities. It was just the same two years ago, when the orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's leadership, volunteered its services in behalf of the San Francisco sufferers.

SYMPHONIC PICTURE THE CHARM OF THE CONCERT

D'Indy's symphonic picture, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," was played for the first time at a Symphony concert on Saturday night. It was exquisitely played, too, and after the second movement there was great applause. Certainly in no other city in the country has the rationalistic music of the distinguished French composer received a more appreciative welcome than here in Boston. In this particular instance the reception was deserved, for this tonal description of a day spent on the mountain is vividly true and beautiful. Perhaps in no other composition has D'Indy given a more impressive exhibition of his talents and his ideas. If music is to be stripped of its time-honored euphony, then "A Summer Day on the Mountain" will serve as a perfect example of the new form.

By way of contrast there was also on the program Schubert's symphony in B flat major, which the orchestra had not played for twenty-five years; and, with its reminiscences of Mozart and Haydn, it presented a most pleasing souvenir of the old days, when everything was powdered and sugared. Schubert was only 19 when he wrote it, but genius develops early. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's stereotyped overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

This week's concert will be the last of the season. Dr. Muck will then make his farewell. The program will consist of Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner pieces, the "Faust" overture, "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

[189]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1908

A Cambridge Concert

The public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston go not to the shorter series in Cambridge. Twenty-four concerts here from October even to May may reasonably suffice it; the programmes in Sanders Theatre usually repeat pieces that have already been played in Symphony Hall and that are oftener classic than new and strange; while the "soloists" of Cambridge are the minor incidents that theoretically they ought to be, though practically they are not, of the concerts in Boston. A smaller orchestra goes to Cambridge than that which weekly fills the stage of Symphony Hall, but the picked men of the band compose it, and its fifty or sixty players sound as no ninety may sound at home. As some say, who believe the acoustics of an auditorium are a happy—or an unhappy—accident, over-much science was applied to Symphony Hall with not altogether fortunate results. At the least, Sanders Theatre is an amphitheatre and not a long, rectangular tunnel. It has walls and a roof of wood and not of that "modern fireproof construction," which is better for safety, perhaps, than for sound. Above all, its smaller dimensions and its circular shape bring audience and orchestra into pleasant and unusual intimacy. Last Thursday, for example, Mr. Wendling happened to play a violin concerto by Mozart—music written for a small room and a small orchestra. In Symphony Hall, with the parts doubled and with all the accepted devices to make such music "sound," it would have seemed pale and thin. In Sanders Theatre it kept its brightness and crispness, its suavity and elegance. The little felicities of figure and ornament in the music came clear and warm to the ear; Mr. Wendling could play the violin part without a thought of forcing; and the accompanying orchestra could keep an agreeable lightness of tone. Most eighteenth century music sounds inflated and over-emphasized in Symphony Hall, and loses thereby something of its animation and transparency. In the finer acoustics and the closer intimacy of Sanders Theatre, it holds its true qualities and distinctions. Even as small an orchestra as Mozart or Haydn often used could play there persuasively.

And the moderns, the opulent, ardent, incisive and clamorous moderns, gain no less. Another "number" of the concert of Thursday happened to be Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony—music that would "sound" anywhere and that at every turn is familiar. None the less in the clearer and finer acoustics of the auditorium in Cambridge and in the closeness of band and listeners the ear and the imagination caught a score of details that hitherto had passed clouded or unheeded. What the textbooks call the inner voices of the instrumental ensemble were clearer. The melodies themselves stood out more sharply and warmly against the harmonic background. Passages of transition had a new aptness. The finer shadings of tone in the virtuosi of the band were more appreciable. In particular every dramatic stroke of the composer and the conductor told on the instant. Once in the regular concerts of last season and once in a Pension Fund concert of this year Dr. Muck has conducted in the "Pathetic" symphony, and there is little need to recall the dramatizing intensity of the performance. Symphonic music though it is, the dramatic quality is uppermost, and the whole is more truly an emotional and a spiritual tragedy in tones than many an avowed music-drama. It is theatrical music, too, music that "tells" with its hearers swiftly and surely. This dramatic, even this theatrical, quality Dr. Muck has emphasized, until he has been almost the operatic conductor again. And in the acoustics and the intimacy of Sanders Theatre he could fairly smite his audience with Tschaikovski's blows or catch them up into the course and passion of the tragedy in tones. Symphony Hall, it seems, may tame even a Russian.

Moreover, these Cambridge concerts have an atmosphere of their own. Here in Boston the Symphony Concerts come and go plentifully in the weekly routine of the musical year. In Cambridge they come at intervals of a month or of six weeks, and they have more the air of an event and even of festivity. The audience—of Cambridge in general rather than of the University in particular—is pleased with itself, with the occasion, with its momentary sense of proprietorship in the orchestra. The other night, at the end of the concert, it recalled Dr. Muck again and again, lingered for him, even waved handkerchiefs at him, quite as though he were departing for good and all and not going back to Boston for five more concerts. Perhaps, however, it was returning the second of the two compliments the conductor has paid it. Eighteen months ago, when Dr. Muck conducted for the first time in Cambridge, he put three symphonies on his programme. Some of his advisers took alarm. "Where should I play three symphonies, if not at a University?" answered the conductor, and by all accounts his audience enjoyed them. With his leave-taking he paid the University his second compliment—the performance of an overture that one of the students in its own department of music had written. No less than with the three symphonies, and as quietly, Dr. Muck waived custom and precedent, and young Mr. Davison heard his "Hero and Leander" at the hands of an orchestra and a conductor that established composers might have envied. With a classic symphony or a modern tone-poem Dr. Muck could not have taken more pains. He made Mr. Davison's sea-music "sound"; he heightened the tumult of his plausible orchestral storm and he set the broken song of the lovers clear against it. With still finer sympathy he slipped over the occasional redundancies of the music; the momentary laxities of form and clumsiness of means; and whenever the young composer had contrived an ingenious or imaginative instrumental stroke, the conductor made it clear and sure. The music "sounded" for itself—and it is the music of a student of talent who needs widening experience and keener self-criticism — and more, but Dr. Muck would have it that the applause was all for the piece and the composer, and not for the performance and the conductor. There has been no more amiable and characteristic incident in all his [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Familiar Mendelssohn, Youthful Schubert, and New and Mature D'Indy—His Tone Pictures of "A Summer Day on the Mountain" for the First Time—Music of Mood and Mystery, Emotion and Revery, with the Mountain to Prompt Them All —A Programme of Contrasts

Dr. Muck's programme at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon ran to ingenious contrasts. "Felix is writing a great instrumental piece, after Goethe," wrote Fanny Mendelssohn eighty years ago, "and he is going to bring together in it two pictures standing in contrast with each other." The "great instrumental piece" is the familiar overture of the glassy sea and then of the stirring wind and water that speed the ship to port. It began the concert on Friday, but it hardly seems so "great" or so pictorial nowadays as it did to the sisterly Fanny and many another admiring pen of the distant twenties. The art of "tone-picturing" has gone fast and far since those days, and for example of it in its present estate, Mr. d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain" ended the concert. Between these "pictures" stood one of Schubert's early symphonies—the symphony in B-flat "without trumpets or drums," and here were plenteous contrasts—Schubert's little band beside d'Indy's modern orchestra with even a piano added; Schubert's spontaneity beside Mendelssohn's nice precision and d'Indy's reflective and searching pains; Schubert's content with tonal pattern and instrumental song for their own sake and d'Indy's insistent effort for fuller and fuller emotional expression; Schubert's gay innocence, Mendelssohn's consciousness of himself and his effects; and d'Indy smitten with the introspection of our time. Schubert charmed and amused, and the listener cared not a penny how much he had remembered of his Mozart or his Haydn. At least he was enough himself to be gayer than they. Mendelssohn pleased with his water-color in tones. You can paint a water-color with spirit as well as nicety, and it is good in these days of ragged and impatient musical energy to see the means so adroitly fitted to the end. Mendelssohn after all, is the stylist of the "just" musical word. The listener may not be keenly interested in what he has to say, but how completely and surely he says it. The Mendelssohnian sea is certainly far enough from Debussy's, but each has the pliant mastery of his resources and the grasp upon his design that brings his purpose exactly to expression.

And Mr. d'Indy in turn in his three "Symphonic Pictures" writes with a large, new freedom that is good to feel again. In the second symphony the sheer magnitude of the design, the depth of the thought, the intensity of passion that the composer [illegible] semed to strive for an expression that even he could not bring to the fulness of his will and ideal. In the "Souvenirs," written since the "tone-pictures" were finished, there is by report a touch of crabbedness as though the reticence of intimate emotions had a little stiffened the composer's hand. 'Summer Day on the Mountain' is spacious, free, elastic and eloquent. The score quotes fragments of a "prose poem" by Roger de Pampelonne as the suggestion and the inspiration of the music, but the deeper inspiration was D'Indy's own spirit, expanding and kindling under the spell of his beloved mountains of the Cévennes. There he has lain the creeping dawn and the fading twilight at the beginning and the end of his [illegible] There he has lain "under the pines" of the sub-title and let the distant sounds of the life of the valley break, and then pronounced again, his revery. There, above all else, he has gained what twenty "prose-poems" might not give the sense of the strength and the calm and mystery of mountains. He has translated the spell and wonder of them and the answering exaltation of spirit that they stir into tones. Somewhere in the music the birds of dawn twitter for an instant; somewhere toward the end there is the suggestion of the creepy shudder in the timid heart of a child as nightfall comes near the forest. These, and many another like them, are details wrought adroitly and imaginatively. The dreamer under the pines hears fitfully the merrymaking or the whirr of busy life in the distant valley and again the music is vivid with suggestion. But the deep, insistent and aspiring voice of it is the voice of the mountains themselves.

Orchestral dawns on sea, or land, [illegible] valley or upon mountain have almost become a convention of music from the first flickerings of the strings and the [illegible] winds to the coming light through the full harmonies of the close, with its flooding sunshine. They suggest much or little according to the imagination and the ingenuity of the composer, but seldom the mystery and the thrill of the advancing light and of the newly created day. Mr. d'Indy is too sincere and self-centred to heed the conventions of orchestral dawns; he is no "realist" to try to make his music more minutely delineative and suggestive. He is poet and idealist, and thus he has sought and translated into tones the thrill and the mystery of the awakening earth. At the beginning he has made sound suggest even a breathless, quivering, expectant silence. It is no less the silence of the man who looks and feels than the stillness of the mountain and valley awaiting the light. The thrill of the coming of the first rays; the fitful glow, the steadying, warming light, the slow fading and then the swift vanishing of the darkness are in the music not as so many "delineations" in tones, but as so many emotions that stir as the poet sees and feels with all his spirit in the solitude of his mountain. Then as swiftly comes the awakening life in the valley below. The mystery has fled. The world stirs [illegible] again. Here is no place to discuss the means and methods by which Mr. d'Indy has translated these moods and pictures into communicating tones. They are [illegible] for the student. The poet's hearers—and Mr. d'Indy is poet, though his [illegible] music—heed only his commanding

...known as it is, is most "pictures" as Mr. D'Indy chooses to call it. The second is music of introspective mood and revery. It is soft and clear with the still air and the still light of the afternoon. To and fro in it go little harmonic flocks, often little dissonances, like the fragments of sound that come vaguely and fitfully to the ear and the fancy in dreamy revery out-of-doors. Then the music clears into the sounds of the valley where life is running its daily and varied course, but the distance softens them and the warm dream-atmosphere idealizes them. The poet wraps himself again in the calm and the peace of his revery, and in the music comes something of the vague longing, the sense of still rapture that spoke so often to beauty in Franck, but that has showed less often in the more intellectual and robust d'Indy. Last, the night, with the brisk, bright stir of the end and the release of the day echoing upward and starting the poet from his dream. Then the stealing tranquility of the fading light, the gathering shadows, the dying sounds, and then the mystery and the quiver of the darkness as it falls upon height and valley and softly mantles them into silence. And the poetry and the beauty of the mu... melt into it.

THE END OF THE SEASON

The Final Symphony Concerts and the Last Choral Concert of the Year

With the final pair of Symphony Concerts for the current season, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck will make his last appearances as the conductor of the orchestra. He has chosen, moreover, to repeat the programme with which he began his work in October of 1906 here in Boston. It begins with Beethoven's fifth symphony and then traverses Wagner's "Faust" overture, his "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Thus Dr. Muck will take leave of his public in a classic masterpiece, a romantic overture, a little tone-poem, and a warm operatic prelude, and in the music of the Beethoven and the Wagner whom he cherishes. Evidently, with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" for ending, he intends a cheerful farewell.

For the general public, outside the particular audiences of the Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck conducts for the last time at the exceptional concert that the orchestra will give on Monday evening, at 8.15, in Symphony Hall for the Chelsea Relief Fund. Again, Beethoven and Wagner in familiar music will make the larger part of his programme—Beethoven with the third "Leonore" overture and the "Emperor" concerto, and Wagner with the overture to "Tannhäuser." The fourth number is French, Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody "España," a riot of vivid rhythms and instrumental coloring that has twice stirred the audiences of the regular Symphony Concerts. In the concerto, and for his last appearance in America this year, Harold Bauer will play the solo part. No city in America has received him more warmly than has Boston, and he was quick to offer his services when "benefits" for Chelsea were afoot. The men of the Symphony Orchestra were as prompt with theirs; every expense of the concert will be paid by those who have arranged it; and the receipts to the last penny will go to the relief fund.

Dr. Muck will make his last appearance in Boston next Friday afternoon, May 1, and Saturday evening, May 2. He will conduct the programme of his first concert in October, two years ago. This is Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; "A Faust overture"; "A Siegfried Idyl," and the Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg, by Richard Wagner. Dr. Muck sails on the following Tuesday week, May 12, for Bremen, and goes directly to Berlin, where he is to direct a number of performances of the Royal Opera. At the end of June he goes to Bayreuth for the summer.

* * * *

On May 6 Mr. Harry Barnhart, tenor, of New York, and Mr. John Beach, com... and pianist, of this city, will give a ...tal under the auspices of the Amer...an Music Society in the Twentieth Century Club hall.

POP CONCERTS

With the end of the season of Symphony concerts on next Saturday night comes the annual series of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, and the opening will be on Tuesday night, May 5. The season this year will be shorter than usual, only seven weeks, the final concert being on Saturday evening, June 20.

Mr. Strube will be the first conductor in the series, and later on, Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, will conduct. Mr. Strube is well known to the patrons of the Pops, and a great favorite with them. Mr. Kautzenbach is one of the 'cellists in the orchestra, and has had much experience in conducting similar concerts in Germany. Full announcement regarding the season will be made next week.

MUCK'S FAREWELL WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OCCURS ON SATURDAY

Dr. Muck will make his last appearance in Boston on next Friday afternoon, May 1, and Saturday evening, May 2. He has chosen for his program the one he used at his first concert in October a year ago. This is Beethoven's fifth symphony; "A Faust Overture," "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg by Richard Wagner. Dr. Muck sails May 12 for Bremen and goes directly to Berlin, where he has to direct a number of performances of the Royal Opera. At the end of June he goes to Bayreuth for the summer.

POP CONCERTS

With the end of the season of Symphony concerts on next Saturday night comes the annual series of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, and the opening will be on Tuesday night, May 5. The season this year will be shorter than usual, only seven weeks, the final concert being on Saturday evening, June 20. Gustav Strube will be the first conductor in the series and later on Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, will conduct. Full announcement regarding the season w... be made next week.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress NEWARK, N.J.

te APR 25 1908

Professor Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

188

SUNDAY POST. APRIL 26. 1908

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY HEARD FOR FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Vincent D'Indy's latest orchestral work, "A Summer Day on the Mountains," was given performance for the first time in this city at the 23d public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra. The programme opened with Mendelssohn's time-worn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and Schubert's B flat symphony, No. 5, was played after a lapse of many years.

The performance of the overture was all that it should have been. We could have relished a work of more novelty and vitality in its place, but it is well to remember that the composition, at time of its inception, was by no means the old story that it is at present. Then, too, it was a not inappropriate commentary of Dr. Muck's coming departure.

Comparisons are odious. It is needless and superfluous to remark upon the inferiority of Schubert's early symphony as compared with those two colossi, the symphonies in B minor and C major. The work that we heard yesterday is well worth listening to. It shows very strongly the influence of Haydn, and it is exemplary to an unfortunate degree of that diffuseness in writing which too often interfered with the strength and durability of Schubert's creations. But in spite of weaknesses one feels unmistakably the personality of the great lyricist. Already there is the boldness and originality in key treatment, the exceptionally clear and brilliant instrumentation. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the exuberance and fertility of invention that we find in practically everything that Schubert wrote.

The music in a way is very difficult to associate with our huge modern concert halls and our swollen orchestras. It is suggestive rather of a small and intimate gathering of friends of sociable and artistic dispositions, of gusto and a friendly ensemble in music making Bohemia.

With the exception of the finale, each movement should be pared. Just here we have incontestible evidence of the potency of live melody as opposed to a manner of writing which would in the case of less inspired tunefulness at once and irretrievably wreck an art creation in a mould which demands for its being an unusual degree of formal perfection. In spite of structural weakness and a musical speech by no means matured, this symphony is aglow with freshness and vigor. It sparkles and sings and how winningly!

In his latest symphonic work D'Indy has spoken with more directness and warmth and intelligibility of that that lies near his heart than seems to have been his wont of late. Of the mystery of darkness and infinite nature, of the mighty exaltation of bursting dawn, of dreams at noon under the pines on the summits; and then the approach of all-embracing night.

He has written with unmistakable sincerity and conviction. The tonic note that is held throughout the range of the great orchestra in long sustained pianissimo measures, the iteration of the fifth and tonic through its reposing depths, are eminently suggestive, and the motive that grows out of these preluding measures brings one yet more deeply into touch with the mood of the composer. The long, magnificent crescendo to the climax, the glorious break of dawn, is well constructed. There are unusual instrumental conceits. The piano is among the instruments of the orchestra. The sensations of the dreamer on the heights are portrayed with extreme care and nicety. A march theme in the brass assumes momentarily absorbing importance. It presently dies away. Deep and euphonious calm ensues. Let us thank heaven that the movement entitled "Evening" does not commence with syrupy harmonies, with cow-calls, or the tinkling of bells, though this is hinted at later. With a vigorous swing the music tells of the merriment of the returning peasant, of the festivity of the home-coming. Soon all grows calmer; "the lambs rush into the fold, and before the crackling fire the peasant woman puts to sleep her little child, whose timid soul dreams of mists, the wolf and the dark border of the forest." Finally the returning motive of the opening, the all-conquering spell of night.

Occasionally, being in the mood, one is tempted to consider Vincent D'Indy the most distinctive figure of the French school of today, a school which, to whatever extent its present vogue is of the moment, is unquestionably [illegible] musical progress, and opening a new, wide, wonderful horizon unto those who seek.

A man singularly and exceptionally without pose, an ardent lover of nature, an antiquarian, in certain respects in his artistic inclinations a thinker of peculiar and perhaps austere habits of imagination abhoring all that approaches sentimentality, whose passion, if cerebral, reaches heights that are known to few, his expression in tones achieve a striking and fascinating compound of the ultra-modern and the archaic, the sensuous and astringent of vivid and daring fantasy and austere intellectuality.

In later days D'Indy has developed a harmonic tendency that is congenial only to certain temperaments, and that has often resulted in sheer and exceeding ugliness. His music is often bare in outline and the harmonies have a bitter twinge. But, like other bitters, they leave a clean taste in the mouth and always he strikes a blow at the sensuality of the age. High and white are his ideals. His technical mastery is in itself overwhelming. It compels unbounded admiration, and like the technic of every original thinker is instinct with the creator's mental and spiritual being, is the characteristic reflection of a strong and unusual personality.

This man, in his earlier works, was convincingly imaginative and fantastical. He began to compose seriously at a comparatively late date, and his individuality at once evidenced itself. In the "Istar" variations he united all his remarkable qualities at their best, and produced one of the undying masterpieces of this century. The "Symphony on a Mountain Air" was a glib and successful experiment which, however, lacked the force of earlier works, as it surpassed them in cleverness and ease of treatment. The extraordinary and much-discussed B flat symphony seems at the present time an extreme manifestation of personal theories.

In these symphonic pictures D'Indy returns to a comparative simplicity and frankness of expression. He speaks, as we have said, of a subject near to his heart. He expresses, we imagine, all that he has to say. No doubt he is an enthusiastic mountaineer and he is always the gentleman. But compare this symphony with that of Brahms in F major, for instance. How puny, how artificial it is by comparison. There you have soul-filling spaces, and earth-might. What is all that carefully constructed crescendo in the D'Indy's first movement when placed by the side of the heroic theme that leaps out as a bolt from the hand of Jupiter. It is as the pleasure of the bland pedagogue breathing the morning air on the way to chapel. So carefully put together! Not a measure would be so ill-bred as to step out beyond the others. Oh for the artist who has more, not less, in him than he can say, whose inspiration bursts through every bond, who says immortal things as inevitably as the sun rises or the waters move. The work is to me, to this humble scribe, the achievement of peaceful middle age on the part of an honorable man deeply versed in musical lore. It has not the bite, the force and the repulsive attractiveness of the B flat symphony, and it has not the vivid, youthful fantasy that rendered even the ...ker earlier works of the composer so ...ter-esting and stimulating.

Dr. Karl Muck will take his farewell of the general public of Boston at the concert to be given tomorrow (Monday) night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Chelsea relief fund. This will be the last opportunity that those who are not subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under his direction. It is an interesting coincidence that Mr. Gericke took his leave of the general public also in a concert of this kind, that which was given for the San Francisco sufferers, two years ago. Mr. Harold Bauer will be soloist.

The programme is as follows: Beethoven: "Leonore" overture, No. 3, "Emperor"; Beethoven: Concerto for piano and orchestra in E-flat major, No. 5; Chabrier: Rhapsody "Espana"; Wagner: Overture to "Tannhauser."

[190]

...UDY'S RARE ... THRILLS AUDIE...

"Summer Day on Mountain" Given Here for First Time at 23d Symphony Concert.

IMPRESSIONISM IS OF MOST DARING NATURE

Dr. Muck's Reading of Mendelssohn's Overture Most Effective in 20 Years.

By PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" ..... Mendelssohn
Symphony in B flat major, No. 6 ..... Schubert
"Summer Day on the Mountain," ..... D'Indy

Dr. Muck gave a fine reading of Mendelssohn's overture, probably the most effective reading of the first section that has been heard here for 20 years. As descriptive, pictorial music the overture still makes an effect, although last night I heard for the first time a reasonable objection to the "Sea-Calm"; that the composer gave no hint at the tremendous force that underlies this plausible treacherous rest.

The symphony by Schubert, composed for a small orchestra, had been played here only once, when it was performed from manuscript at a concert led by Mr. Henschel in 1883. Lovers of Schubert may well question the advisability of reviving the early symphonies, which for the most part are mere echoes of Mozart and Haydn. The greater part of the symphony in B flat major is merely amiable music, characterized by endless repetitions of themes without inherent significance and by rows of cast-iron formulas. Now and then there is a hint at the later Schubert, the composer of the wondrous "Unfinished," but these hints are feeble and far between. The symphony was performed with much care and the audience applauded with the fervor which it is safe to show toward one long dead and ticketed among the immortals.

The score of d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain"—composed in 1905 and performed for the first time at Paris early in 1906—contains a prose poem by Roger de Pampelonne, who, I believe, is a relation of the composer, by blood or by marriage. It is fair, then, to assume that musical thought was here suggested by a text; but d'Indy, always a lover of nature, and at home among the barren and forbidding mountains of the Cevennes, did not need a literary stimulus. Perhaps it is unfortunate that the poem is printed in the score, for, reprinted in programme books, it may lead the hearers to look for an interlinear translation into tones, and there is such a mass of detail in the prose poem that the attempt to put it all into music would be absurd and wholly foreign to d'Indy's fastidious taste.

There are beautiful pages in this work, pages that suggest both the ineffable calm that is found only on the heights, and the consolation and the reassurance that come to one in solitude far above the din, the babble, the passions of the burgess-warrens with their fret and fury of seeming importance. Especially beautiful are the pages in the third section, "Evening," which come just before the return to the mood of the first section, "Daybreak." After the dawn, and even in the "Afternoon under the Pines," sounds and noises of earth arise, incongruous, ridiculous; at last they die away, and again there is only the one idea of illimitable space and communion with the Infinite.

This music is impressionistic, not panoramic, and the impressionism is of the most daring nature. To some it will be mere foolishness. They will remember a night on Mt. Washington and fail to hear their recollections recorded in d'Indy's score. The composer might have said, with the Psalmist: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." He had no thought of a convenient railway to the summit, of cars laden with picnickers, who would insult the majesty of the mountain by leaving paper bags, empty cans and bottles on its venerable flank.

The hearer of this music must first of all meet the composer in an imaginative spirit. He must go to d'Indy's mountain—or, at least, meet it half-way.

As a feat of technic, the composition is mirific. The harmonic progressions are daring even for the man who wrote the noble symphony in B flat and the gorgeous "Istar" variations. The instrumentation is marvellously original, brilliant, eloquent. Even those who have not yet fully mastered this great composer's language were thrilled by the triumphant outburst in "Daybreak" and deeply moved by the intimate beauty and tenderness of the latter half of "Evening." The performance by the orchestra was one long to be remembered.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

APR 24 1908

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston on May 1 and 2, respectively. He will leave with the same programme he ... his first appearance in October ... hoven's C minor symphony and ... Overture," the "Sea" and Idyl ... prelude to "The Mastersingers of ... berg" of Wagner.

...dawn is in this first "picture," as Mr. d'Indy chooses to call it. The second is music of introspective mood and revery. It is soft and clear with the still air and the still light of the afternoon. To and fro in it go little harmonic flecks, often little dissonances, like the fragments of sound that come vaguely and fitfully to the ear and the fancy in dreamy revery out-of-doors. Then the music clears into the sounds of the valley where life is running its daily and varied course, but the distance softens them and the warm dream-atmosphere idealizes them. The poet wraps himself again in the calm and the peace of his revery, and in the music comes something of the vague longing, the sense of still rapture that spoke so often to beauty in Franck, but that has showed less often in the more intellectual and robust d'Indy. Last, the night, with the brisk, bright stir of the end and the release of the day echoing upward and startling the poet from his dream. Then the stealing tranquility of the fading light, the gathering shadows, the dying sounds, and then the mystery and the quiver of the darkness as it falls upon height and valley and softly mantles them into silence. And the poetry and the beauty of the m... melt into it.

THE END OF THE SEASON

The Final Symphony Concerts and the Last Choral Concert of the Year

With the final pair of Symphony Concerts for the current season, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck will make his last appearances as the conductor of the orchestra. He has chosen, moreover, to repeat the programme with which he began his work in October of 1906 here in Boston. It begins with Beethoven's fifth symphony and then traverses Wagner's "Faust" overture, his "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Thus Dr. Muck will take leave of his public in a classic masterpiece, a romantic overture, a little tone-poem, and a warm operatic prelude, and in the music of the Beethoven and the Wagner whom he cherishes. Evidently, with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" for ending, he intends a cheerful farewell.

For the general public, outside the particular audiences of the Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck conducts for the last time at the exceptional concert that the orchestra will give on Monday evening, at 8.15, in Symphony Hall for the Chelsea Relief Fund. Again, Beethoven and Wagner in familiar music will make the larger part of his programme—Beethoven with the third "Leonore" overture and the "Emperor" concerto, and Wagner with the overture to "Tannhäuser." The fourth number is French, Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody "España," a riot of vivid rhythms and instrumental coloring that has twice stirred the audiences of the regular Symphony Concerts. In the concerto, and for his last appearance in America this year, Harold Bauer will play the solo part. No city in America has received him more warmly than has Boston, and he was quick to offer his services when "benefits" for Chelsea were afoot. The men of the Symphony Orchestra were as prompt with theirs; every expense of the concert will be paid by those who have arranged it; and the receipts to the last penny will go to the relief fund.

Dr. Muck will make his last appearance in Boston next Friday afternoon, May 1, and Saturday evening, May 2. He will conduct the programme of his first concert in October, two years ago. This is Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; "A Faust overture"; "A Siegfried Idyl," and the Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg, by Richard Wagner. Dr. Muck sails on the following Tuesday week, May 12, for Bremen, and goes directly to Berlin, where he is to direct a number of performances of the Royal Opera. At the end of June he goes to Bayreuth for the summer.

* * * *

On May 6 Mr. Harry Barnhart, tenor, of New York, and Mr. John Beach, com... and pianist, of this city, will give a ...ital under the auspices of the Amer...ican Music Society in the Twentieth Century Club hall.

POP CONCERTS

With the end of the season of Symphony concerts on next Saturday night comes the annual series of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, and the opening will be on Tuesday night, May 5. The season this year will be shorter than usual, only seven weeks, the final concert being on Saturday evening, June 20.

Mr. Strube will be the first conductor in the series, and later on, Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, will conduct. Mr. Strube is well known to the patrons of the Pops, and a great favorite with them. Mr. Kautzenbach is one of the 'cellists in the orchestra, and has had much experience in conducting similar concerts in Germany. Full announcement regarding the season will be made next week.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1908.

MUCK'S FAREWELL WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OCCURS ON SATURDAY

Dr. Muck will make his last appearance in Boston on next Friday afternoon, May 1, and Saturday evening, May 2. He has chosen for his program the one he used at his first concert in October a year ago. This is Beethoven's fifth symphony; "A Faust Overture," "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg by Richard Wagner. Dr. Muck sails May 12 for Bremen and goes directly to Berlin, where he has to direct a number of performances of the Royal Opera. At the end of June he goes to Bayreuth for the summer.

POP CONCERTS

With the end of the season of Symphony concerts on next Saturday night comes the annual series of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, and the opening will be on Tuesday night, May 5. The season this year will be shorter than usual, only seven weeks, the final concert being or Saturday evening, June 20. Gustav Strube will be the first conductor in the series and later on Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, will conduct. Full announcement regarding the season w... be made next week.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om .....

dress ..... N.Y.

te .....

Professor Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

* * *

SUNDAY POST. APRIL 26. 1908

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY HEARD FOR FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Vincent D'Indy's latest orchestral work, "A Summer Day on the Mountains," was given performance for the first time in this city at the 23d public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra. The programme opened with Mendelssohn's time-worn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and Schubert's B flat symphony, No. 5, was played after a lapse of many years.

The performance of the overture was all that it should have been. We could have relished a work of more novelty and vitality in its place, but it is well to remember that the composition, at time of its inception, was by no means the old story that it is at present. Then, too, it was a not inappropriate commentary of Dr. Muck's coming departure.

Comparisons are odious. It is needless and superfluous to remark upon the inferiority of Schubert's early symphony as compared with those two colossi, the symphonies in B minor and C major. The work that we heard yesterday is well worth listening to. It shows very strongly the influence of Haydn, and it is exemplary to an unfortunate degree of that diffuseness in writing which too often interfered with the strength and durability of Schubert's creations. But in spite of weaknesses one feels unmistakably the personality of the great lyricist. Already there is the boldness and originality in key treatment, the exceptionally clear and brilliant instrumentation. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the exuberance and fertility of invention that we find in practically everything that Schubert wrote.

The music in a way is very difficult to associate with our huge modern concert halls and our swollen orchestras. It is suggestive rather of a small and intimate gathering of friends of sociable and artistic dispositions, of gusto and a friendly ensemble in music making Bohemia.

With the exception of the finale, each movement should be pared. Just here we have incontestible evidence of the potency of live melody as opposed to a manner of writing which would in the case of less inspired tunefulness at once and irretrievably wreck an art creation in a mould which demands for its being an unusual degree of formal perfection. In spite of structural weakness and a musical speech by no means matured, this symphony is aglow with freshness and vigor. It sparkles and sings—and how winningly!

In his latest symphonic work D'Indy has spoken with more directness and warmth and intelligibility of that that lies near his heart than seems to have been his wont of late. Of the mystery of darkness and infinite nature, of the mighty exaltation of bursting dawn, of dreams at noon under the pines on the summits; and then the approach of all-embracing night.

He has written with unmistakable sincerity and conviction. The tonic note that is held throughout the range of the great orchestra in long sustained pianissimo measures, the iteration of the fifth and tonic through its reposing depths, are eminently suggestive, and the motive that grows out of these preluding measures brings one yet more deeply into touch with the mood of the composer. The long, magnificent crescendo to the climax, the glorious break of dawn, is well constructed. There are unusual instrumental conceits. The piano is among the instruments of the orchestra. The sensations of the dreamer on the heights are portrayed with extreme care and nicety. A march theme in the brass assumes momentarily absorbing importance. It presently dies away. Deep and euphonious calm ensues. Let us thank heaven that the movement entitled "Evening" does not commence with syrupy harmonies, with cow-calls, or the tinkling of bells, though this is hinted at later. With a vigorous swing the music tells of the merriment of the returning peasant, of the festivity of the home-coming. Soon all grows calmer; "the lambs rush into the fold, and before the crackling fire the peasant woman puts to sleep her little child, whose timid soul dreams of mists, the wolf and the dark border of the forest." Finally the returning motive of the opening, the all-conquering spell of night.

Occasionally, being in the mood, one is tempted to consider Vincent D'Indy the most distinctive figure of the French school of today, a school which, to whatever extent its present vogue is of the moment, is unquestionably exerting the strongest influence upon ... contemporaneous musical progress, and opening a new, wide, wonderful horizon unto those who seek.

A man singularly and exceptionally without pose, an ardent lover of nature, an antiquarian, in certain respects in his artistic inclinations a thinker of peculiar and perhaps austere habits of imagination abhoring all that approaches sentimentality, whose passion, if cerebral, reaches heights that are known to few, his expression in tones achieve a striking and fascinating compound of the ultra-modern and the archaic, the sensuous and astringent of vivid and daring fantasy and austere intellectuality.

In later days D'Indy has developed a harmonic tendency that is congenial only to certain temperaments, and that has often resulted in sheer and exceeding ugliness. His music is often bare in outline and the harmonies have a bitter twinge. But, like other bitters, they leave a clean taste in the mouth and always he strikes a blow at the sensuality of the age. High and white are his ideals. His technical mastery is in itself overwhelming. It compels unbounded admiration, and like the technic of every original thinker is instinct with the creator's mental and spiritual being, is the characteristic reflection of a strong and unusual personality.

This man, in his earlier works, was convincingly imaginative and fantastical. He began to compose seriously at a comparatively late date, and his individuality at once evidenced itself. In the "Istar" variations he united all his remarkable qualities at their best, and produced one of the undying masterpieces of this century. The "Symphony on a Mountain Air" was a glib and successful experiment which, however, lacked the force of earlier works, as it surpassed them in cleverness and ease of treatment. The extraordinary and much-discussed B flat symphony seems at the present time an extreme manifestation of personal theories.

In these symphonic pictures D'Indy returns to a comparative simplicity and frankness of expression. He speaks, as we have said, of a subject near to his heart. He expresses, we imagine, all that he has to say. No doubt he is an enthusiastic mountaineer and he is always the gentleman. But compare this symphony with that of Brahms in F major, for instance. How puny, how artificial it is by comparison. There you have soul-filling spaces, and earth-might. What is all that carefully constructed crescendo in the D'Indy's first movement when placed by the side of the heroic theme that leaps out as a bolt from the hand of Jupiter. It is as the pleasure of the bland pedagogue breathing the morning air on the way to chapel. So carefully put together! Not a measure would be so ill-bred as to step out beyond the others. Oh for the artist who has more, not less, in him than he can say, whose inspiration bursts through every bond, who says immortal things as inevitably as the sun rises or the waters move. The work is to me, to this humble scribe, the achievement of peaceful middle age on the part of an honorable man deeply versed in musical lore. It has not the bite, the force and the repulsive attractiveness of the B flat symphony, and it has not the vivid, youthful fantasy that rendered even the ... earlier works of the composer so ...teresting and stimulating.

Dr. Karl Muck will take his farewell of the general public of Boston at the concert to be given tomorrow (Monday) night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Chelsea relief fund. This will be the last opportunity that those who are not subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under his direction. It is an interesting coincidence that Mr. Gericke took his leave of the general public also in a concert of this kind, that which was given for the San Francisco sufferers, two years ago. Mr. Harold Bauer will be soloist.

The programme is as follows: Beethoven: "Leonore" overture, No. 3, "Emperor"; Beethoven: Concerto for piano and orchestra in E-flat major, No. 5; Chabrier: Rhapsody "Espana"; Wagner: Overture to "Tannhauser."

[190]

HERALD—BOSTON.

APRIL 26, 1908.

D'INDY'S RARE MUSIC THRILLS AUDIENCE

"Summer Day on Mountain" Given Here for First Time at 23d Symphony Concert.

IMPRESSIONISM IS OF MOST DARING NATURE

Dr. Muck's Reading of Mendelssohn's Overture Most Effective in 20 Years.

By PHILIP HALE.

188

The programme of the 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage.....Mendelssohn
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5.....Schubert
"Summer Day on the Mountain,".....D'Indy

Dr. Muck gave a fine reading of Mendelssohn's overture, probably the most effective reading of the first section that has been heard here for 20 years. As descriptive, pictorial music the overture still makes an effect, although last night I heard for the first time a reasonable objection to the "Sea-Calm"; that the composer gave no hint at the tremendous force that underlies this plausible, treacherous rest.

The symphony by Schubert, composed for a small orchestra, had been played here only once, when it was performed from manuscript at a concert led by Mr. Henschel in 1883. Lovers of Schubert may well question the advisability of reviving the early symphonies, which for the most part are mere echoes of Mozart and Haydn. The greater part of the symphony in B flat major is merely amiable music, characterized by endless repetitions of themes without inherent significance and by rows of cast-iron formulas. Now and then there is a hint at the later Schubert, the composer of the wondrous "Unfinished," but these hints are feeble and far between. The symphony was performed with much care, and the audience applauded with the fervor which it is safe to show toward one long dead and ticketed among the immortals.

The score of d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain"—composed in 1905 and performed for the first time at Paris early in 1906—contains a prose poem by Roger de Pampelonne, who, I believe, is a relation of the composer, by blood or by marriage. It is fair, then, to assume that musical thought was here suggested by a text; but d'Indy, always a lover of nature, and at home among the barren and forbidding mountains of the Cevennes, did not need a literary stimulus. Perhaps it is unfortunate that the poem is printed in the score, for, reprinted in programme books, it may lead the hearers to look for an interlinear translation into tones, and there is such a mass of detail in the prose poem that the attempt to put it all into music would be absurd and wholly foreign to d'Indy's fastidious taste.

There are beautiful pages in this work, pages that suggest both the ineffable calm that is found only on the heights, and the consolation and the reassurance that come to one in solitude far above the din, the babble, the passions of the burgess-warrens with their fret and fury of seeming importance. Especially beautiful are the pages in the third section, "Evening," which come just before the return to the mood of the first section, "Daybreak." After the dawn, and even in the "Afternoon under the Pines," sounds and noises of earth arise, incongruous, ridiculous; at last they die away, and again there is only the one idea of illimitable space and communion with the Infinite.

This music is impressionistic, not panoramic, and the impressionism is of the most daring nature. To some it will be mere foolishness. They will remember a night on Mt. Washington and fail to hear their recollections recorded in d'Indy's score. The composer might have said, with the Psalmist: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." He had no thought of a convenient railway to the summit, of cars laden with picnickers, who would insult the majesty of the mountain by leaving paper bags, empty cans and bottles on its venerable flank.

The hearer of this music must first of all meet the composer in an imaginative spirit. He must go to d'Indy's mountain—or, at least, meet it half-way.

As a feat of technic, the composition is mirific. The harmonic progressions are daring even for the man who wrote the noble symphony in B flat and the gorgeous "Istar" variations. The instrumentation is marvellously original, brilliant, eloquent. Even those who have not yet fully mastered this great composer's language were thrilled by the triumphant outburst in "Baybreak" and deeply moved by the intimate beauty and tenderness of the latter half of "Evening." The performance by the orchestra was one long to be remembered.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

APR 24 1908

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston on May 1 and 2, respectively. He will take leave with the same programme he used at his first appearance in October, 1906: Beethoven's C minor symphony and "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner.

CAMP AT SUBJECTS OF THE SYMPHONY

Some Baseless Criticism of Programmes Carried Out This Season

HEARING SIGHS FOR WORK OF PAST DAYS

Good Omen That the Hypercritics Are Omitting Personalities.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Some persons have objected to the programmes of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this season. Some of these complainers have voiced their woe by word of mouth. I am told that others have taken the trouble to write to a newspaper or two, asking what could be done—whether the Watch and Ward Society might not be persuaded to interfere. Only yesterday a most amiable man said to me: "We have had hardly anything from the classics this season."

The 27th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will end next Saturday. The orchestra will then have played a symphony by C. P. E. Bach, and a work of J. S. Bach; five symphonies and two overtures by Beethoven; three compositions by Brahms, who is already classed by the complainers among "the classics"; a symphony by Haydn; a concerto for strings and two choirs of wind instruments by Handel; four compositions by Mozart, among them two symphonies; two works of Mendelssohn, two of Schumann, and an unfamiliar symphony by Schubert.

Twenty-three "classic" works, and yet the complainers have heard them not or have forgotten that they were played. Other composers, who have not the misfortune to be alive and therefore suspicious if not dangerous characters, have been represented at these concerts: Liszt, Wagner, Rubinstein, Lalo, Bizet, Goetz, Rheinberger, Dvorak, Berlioz, Tschaikowsky.

It is useless to argue with these complainers, especially as a few show signs of chronic hysteria. "Beethoven!" and they roll eyes heavenward. One of these complainers wondered recently why the orchestra had not played the overture to "Coriolanus" at a certain concert before the intermission, as was announced. The complaint was made passionately in the corridor. As a matter of fact, the overture had been played, and in the order of the announcement. The complainer had mistaken it for the finale of a little symphony by C. P. E. Bach. The three movements of this symphony were played, as written, without pauses between them, and the complainer lost count. Yes, let us have more Beethoven, so that the overture to "Coriolanus" may be recognized when it is heard.

No conductor, if he should spend anxious nights and laborious days on the task of making programmes, could satisfy everybody. There has always been complaint here about the programmes of symphony concerts, and there will be no doubt as long as the concerts will be given. There are always fanatics who wish to hear only the old; there are always fanatics who turn the back on what has been well done and would fain hear only the new. It would be hard to say which set is the more tiresome, or is the more injurious to the healthy musical condition of the town.

There are some, however, who, willing to know what is now going on in the world, listen patiently to compositions of the modern school and with the best intention are unable to find anything interesting, beautiful or impressive in them. They honestly prefer even a second-rate symphony or overture by some one that died, provided they have heard it before, to a new, brilliant, engrossing work. Their ears are unaccustomed to the more complex sonorous combinations, to the more subtle melodic shapes and disguises.

For first of all an average listener submits himself to the elementary action of sound. As Mr. Lionel de la Laurencie puts it, our sensations possess a tone that is individually affected so that the pitch of sounds, their characteristic qualities, their quick or slow succession, their harmonic quarrels give rise to individual sentiments varying infinitely according to the various combinations to which the preceding factors may lend themselves. Viewed subjectively, these sonorous sensations are far from having the same value. To the average hearer, contact with a musical work is confined to a series of sonorous impressions. Perception of form is to him only a phenomenon of memory. Dr. de Fleury has explained this: "When I listen to a work, if it goes above the level of complexity to which I have attained, the music gives me a feeling of oppression, boredom, almost hostility. Hearing it twice or thrice I distinguish some order in the chaos; certain passages give me pleasure. Now the passages which have afforded me some aesthetic excitement are neither the most uncommon, nor the most characteristic of the composer's genius; they are the least novel; they resemble somewhat musical compositions that are already in the memory."

The emotion results therefore from a recognition, from finding again a sensation known in the past.

This also may be said: "Whoever feels aesthetic emotion in any degree, spectator, hearer, dilettante, remakes, according to his force, the work of the creator. The spectator will feel nothing unless there be some analogy between his nature and that of the creator, however faint this analogy may be." This is a saying of Ribot and there is a great truth in it, which Walt Whitman knew when he defined all music as "what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments."

The fresh gay spirit, the simply and [illegible] marked rhythm of a symphony by Haydn are easily understood by any one that is not wholly tone-deaf. Some hearers never get beyond a Haydn symphony. Therefore they clamor for Haydn and more Haydn. The hearer of greater sensibility also likes Haydn in spite of his formalism and endless chatter. The music reminds him of the bourgeois city and period of the composer; he recalls the life; he begins to speculate about the development of the symphony and Haydn's share in this; at the same time the gayety and the simple sentiment refresh him. He likes to hear a symphony by Haydn now and then; but he derives a higher, more intense, more ennobling enjoyment from the first symphony of Brahms, the symphony in D by Cesar Franck or the superb symphony in B flat by Vincent d'Indy.

Furthermore this hearer does not make the mistake of comparing the composer of 1800 with the composer of 1900; he realizes that the man of 1800 must be compared with those of his own period.

Then there is the good-natured or sentimental hearer who is governed largely by the force of association. We are all more or less thus governed. When I was a boy I used to hear my mother play in the twilight Beethoven's "Spirit" waltz, as the piece was called. I have often looked for it since—it probably was in some old instruction book—and have not found it, but it would be hard to persuade me that this waltz is not one of Beethoven's masterpieces or that the performance was not inimitable. The first orchestral piece I remember was the overture to "La Muette de Portici," played by the Germania orchestra of Boston in a town of Hampshire county. It was a wonderful overture then; it surely is now and I should like to hear it at a symphony concert. Would the audience sit up when the triangle came in as the hearers sat up in the town hall in Northampton?

Is there any more impressive funeral tune than "China"?

Why should we mourn departed friends
And shake at death's alarms?

I quote from memory and probably incorrectly, for modern hymn and tune books with their rank sentimentalism and preference for that which is genteel, ignore the sturdy old verses and the fine old tunes. Is there any nobler anthem than the old setting "Denmark" to "Before Jehovah's Awful Throne?"

In this instance judgment is overruled by association. I take the liberty of being personal, for I believe my own case is merely one in ten thousand. In the Symphony audience there must be many who have associations with this symphony of Haydn or that overture of Beethoven, and when they hear a composition the familiar sounds are more than sounds, they have color and form; they are furnished with a text by the hearer; or they are as frames to portraits of dear ones long dead and buried.

Yet, why should any sane person, who is honestly interested in music, be unwilling to learn what composers of this day and generation are doing, how they are thinking and expressing themselves? This unwillingness sometimes turns into open hostility. This is one of the most disagreeable forms of Philistinism. The music is new; it must therefore be ugly or incomprehensible, or both.

The story is a very old one. There were the same complainers, there was the same stupid hostility in the days of Monteverde, Gluck, Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner. Even the first symphony of Beethoven was, in the year of its birth, considered monstrous by many. Strauss, d'Indy, Loeffler and Debussy were never more assailed than was Schumann. But the complainers forget all this or do not know it.

The complainers apparently believe that music is an art that has been determined for all time; that Schumann, or possible Brahms, spoke the last word; that there can be no progress in harmonic scheme, melodic line, form of structure, orchestral color. "Why should we listen to the experiments of audacious innovators?" "This music is not music, it is bosh; it is an insult." And so on, and so on.

They should read a remarkable book, "The Threshold of Music: An Inquiry Into the Development of the Musical Sense," by William Wallace, a composer of symphonies, symphonic poems, suites and songs, a composer of talent, born at Greenock in 1860, a man of much more than ordinary general culture. This book, published by the Macmillan Company, is entertaining and singularly instructive. I have alluded to this book before, and quoted passages with reference to the amazing egoism of virtuosos. Mr. Wallace's contempt for this class of musicians leads him to a violence that is amusing, although it may seem to be exaggeration, as when he speaks of "a clammy breed of youth, long-haired and bottle-shouldered for the most part—lads clamorous for notoriety, eager for the opportunity to dangle themselves (not, unfortunately, from a lamp post) before a gaping public."

Mr. Wallace first describes the ignorant, complacent, or flippant attitude of men of science toward music. The scientific man is easily satisfied with his own conclusions regarding the probable origin of some faculty. "He is content to rely upon his hypothesis without regard to those influences which from century to century may have affected man's intellectual progress. The scientific mind has not been at pains to investigate those psychic manifestations which appertain to music." Music as an expression of mental energy has put forth its activities only within the last 200 years. It is impossible to prove its utility or disprove its non-necessity.

These complainers against Dr. Muck's programmes do not keep the perspective of history in view. "In our own time Wagner may seem as far as in advance of Beethoven as Beethoven was in advance of Scarlatti. Some today may place Beethoven on the shelf among the musical antiques—at a later day others may perceive, with the progress of the musical sense, little difference between Wagner and Beethoven. Already Wagner, the daring revolutionist, seems to many to have gone scarcely a step further than Meyerbeer. In our own time we may be witnessing a strange act of profligacy on the part of nature, the sowing of her wild oats, the purging of mankind as regards his musical sense, so that in time to come, humanity will be the fitter to receive and cherish music in some ampler measure." In a word, Mr. Wallace believes that music is still in its infancy, "and that the utmost effort of the most notable composer of our own time or of past time, will be but an iota in the inscription recording man's endeavor toward its accomplishment."

Nor should it be forgotten that music is the youngest of the arts and that which we call "classical" is the work of men who, in the flight of time, are really our contemporaries.

The development [illegible] so swift, the advance in musical thought and imagination has been so prodigious that Mr. Wallace sees the explanation only in the supposition that a new faculty has come into existence in recent years. "We may assume that the centre for music in the brain consists of a ganglion of nerve-cells which has remained in an embryonic state for countless centuries until through some stimulus it has acquired characters sufficiently definite to entitle it to be regarded as an accessary sense."

Mr. Wallace studies the primitive conditions—how man first sang in a spirit of mimicry, awakened by "the whirring of the fibre in its socket, the moan of the wind and the whip of the rain." Music has no history to look back upon; its accomplishments are in the last two centuries; but the great pyramid was built 6600 years ago, the Parthenon arose 2500 years ago, and Botticelli, Tintoretto, Paul Veronese, Holbein, Rembrandt, Michael Angelo and Velasquez completed their life work before Bach was born. The Athenian attained his ideal of completeness without music, as music is known to us. This Greek music, a series of notes forming a scale, was enough to satisfy human needs through the early centuries of the Christian era. The scale seemed to be regarded as the finality of musical expression. Centuries passed before there was any craving for what we call harmony. Tunes of the people, of Thessalian shepherds, of Chian wine pressers may have come down to Gregory's time and even now be in cathedral chants. Music remained in an embryonic condition for 1200 years. Even the chord of three notes and the sequence of two or more chords are not much older than Westminster Abbey. The human ear could not for centuries appreciate the sounding of three notes together. When music began to extend its boundaries, it did so in defiance of the theorists.

The formulas of church music ruled, and the only difference between the sacred and the secular in the music of Palestrina and others lay in the words. The art was finally carried to the utmost limits that theorists would allow.

Then arose Claudio Monteverde (1567-1643), the first great innovator, the first of a long line of musical reformers "who did not enjoy (if the word is not grotesquely inappropriate) the benefits of a 'sound musical education.'" A few may have foreshadowed some of his innovations, but he is the great ancestor. "He applied himself to an entirely new interpretation of the art, and refused to accept the routine fashion in which words were set. He attempted to illuminate his texts by sounds which were not altogether stereotyped." He and his school attempted to get nearer the human heart. He attempted to find use for every conceivable instrument. Knowing the value of contrasted tone colors, he also knew how to select appropriate combinations of instruments and he endeavored to interpret literally the dramatic situation. He found that by employing a large body of instruments he could give character to his themes. Mr. Wallace also says: "He is castigated by a school, which, while it anathematises all music evincing the slightest divergence from the 'Sonata form,' or attempting to suggest to the mind of the hearer what was in the mind of the composer, is only too ready to accept, in another art, the drab sermonizings of men who turn their studios into conventicles for the elect—a school, which, while denying to a composer the right to describe in his programme just what he means, scans with breathless awe the painter's typewritten descriptions, issued in hornbook fashion, as if they were the sublimest quotations from Holy Writ."

We must leave Mr. Wallace's book for a week. It will be seen next Sunday that his conclusions bear directly on this subject of Dr. Muck's programmes, which to many of us have been both entertaining and beneficent.

At the same time it is a good sign when there is any discussion concerning music rather than about the personality of its interpreters. Without discussion, however absurd or bitter it may be, there is no progress in art, there is no real interest in art. Where there is no dispute there is stagnation, and stagnation implies complacency, that is the child of ignorance and indifference.

Raymond Haven will give a piano recital in Beacon Hall, Harvard street, Brookline, on Tuesday evening.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN AID OF THE CHELSEA RELIEF FUND.

Dr. Karl Muck will take his farewell of the general public of Boston at the concert to be given tomorrow (Monday) night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Chelsea relief fund. This will be the last opportunity that those who are not subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under his direction. It is an interesting coincidence that Mr. Gericke took his leave of the general public also in a concert of this kind, the one given for the San Francisco sufferers two years ago. With the sentimental interest attached to Dr. Muck's departure and the good cause for which the concert is being given, and to which the entire receipts will be devoted, with Harold Bauer and a most attractive programme, there is no doubt that as much money will be taken in for the Chelsea fire sufferers as was taken in for those of San Francisco two years ago. The programme is as follows:

"Leonore," overture, No. 3.....Beethoven
Concerto for piano and orchestra in E-flat major, No. 5.....Beethoven
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

POP CONCERTS.

With the end of the season of Symphony concerts on next Saturday night comes the annual series of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, and the opening will be on Tuesday night, May 5. The season this year will be shorter than usual, [illegible]ven weeks, the final concert being on Saturday evening, June 20th.

Mr. Strube will be the first conductor in the series, and later on Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, will conduct. Mr. Strube is well known to the patrons of the Pops, and a great favorite with them. Mr. Kautzenbach is one of the 'cellists in the orchestra and has had considerable experience conducting similar concerts in Germany. Full announcement regarding the season will be made next Sunday.

Two Novelties at the Symphony Concert.

—"Pops" Soon to Begin.

Symphony's Chelsea Fund Benefit—Gossip.

The 23d Symphony program opened with Mendelssohn's overture, "Seacalm and Prosperous Voyage," followed by Schubert's fifth symphony, which has not been played here for a score of years, the final number being D'Indy's new piece, "Semmer Day on the Mountain," which was given for the first time at these concerts. Mr Heinrich Gebhardt played the brief piano part in the D'Indy poem. Dr Muck was ambidexterous in conducting on account of continuous lameness, but that in no way affected the performance.

Lovers of pure melody must have taken keen enjoyment in the first two pieces. The Mendelssohn overture is gentle and restful with but brief fortissimo outbursts. A delightful picture at first of a dead calm at sea, and later illustrating a fair breeze and prosperous voyage to destination. The master has treated the subject so clearly that the title, in this case, is no misnomer and Dr Muck's reading was very expressive and exquisitely was it interpreted by the orchestra.

Schubert's neglected fifth symphony omits nearly all the brasses and instruments of percussion, and is scored for strings, two horns and woodwinds, evidently originally written for a small orchestra. The four movements are beautiful examples of Schubert's skill in utilizing melodic forms in expressing his ideas. Also in three of the parts are shown his fondness for the flute, this instrument being allotted many delicate passages.

Beginning with a flowing melody of samber character, this theme is woven into many different forms throughout the first movement. Each group takes up and develops a simple theme which is the basis of the second part, and in the third a broader and resonant orchestration is introduced, the chief material for working out being introduced by the lower register of the violins. In the closing movement lightness and vivacity, melodious always, are the characteristics.

A feature of the performance, aside from precision in all the ensemble work, was the delicacy in piano and pianissimo passages revealed by the men. There was nothing uncertain or clouded about the tone, and the instrumental balance was seemingly perfect.

D'Indy's poem is modern in style, though not ultra-modern, and of course complex in the instrumentation, for this celebrated French composer and conductor knows thoroughly the resources of the orchestra of today. The tone pictures are based upon a fanciful impassioned poem by Roger de Pampelonne and typify in imagination, a very imagination, too, emotions and incidents associated with a day on the mountains.

Daybreak, afternoon and evening are the division titles; each skilfully depicted in vivid tonal colors, which though they may not be comprehended by everyone, are nevertheless wonderfully effective.

"Daybreak" opens with one chord long sustained on the lighter strings pianissimo, until the morning mists and phantoms vanish and other visions appear, only to make room for succeeding scenes and incidents conjured up by poet and illustrated by composer. "Day," probably because of "more doing," runs largely to broken phrases, dissonants and other instrumental things suggestive of turmoil, and later of more peaceful episodes. And "Evening" brings forth restful strains from the orchestra, closing the allegory midst a kind of musical tranquility.

It is difficult to judge fairly of a descriptive work of such big proportions after only one hearing. Splendidly conceived and set forth by one of the foremost musicians of the day it commands attention even from the novice or the prejudiced person in musical affairs. The details evidently are carefully worked up, for many of the climaxes are impressive and all through the poem are evidences of D'Indy's mastery of his subject. The performance was imbued with all necessary dymatic values and significant poetic power, although the players were unable to make clear all the puzzling moments when the composer's intent was vague and seemingly chaotic.

Dr Muck will make his last appearance in Boston this week, and he has chosen for his program the one he used at his first concert in October, 1906. This is Beethoven's fifth symphony, "A Faust overture"; "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers," by Richard Wagner. Dr Muck sails May 12 for Bremen and goes directly to Berlin, where he is to direct a number of performances of the Royal opera. At the end of June he goes to Bayreuth for the summer.

In Aid of Chelsea Relief Fund.

Dr Karl Muck will take his farewell of the general public of Boston at the concert to be given tomorrow night by the Boston Symphony orchestra in aid of the Chelsea relief fund. This will be the last opportunity that those who are not subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under his direction. It is an interesting coincidence that Mr Gericke took his leave of the general public also in a concert of this kind, the one given for the San Francisco sufferers two years ago.

With the sentimental interest attached to Dr Muck's departure and the good cause for which the concert is being given, and to which the entire receipts will be devoted, with Harold Bauer and a most attractive program, there is no doubt that as much money will be taken in for our own fire sufferers as was received for those of San Francisco two years ago.

The program is as follows:

Overture, Leonore, No 3.....Beethoven
Concerto, Emperor, for piano and orchestra, Beethoven
Rhapsody, Espana.....Chabvier
Overture, Tannbauser.....Wagner

[191]

...ts the annual series of Pop concerts at Symphony hall, and the opening will be Tuesday night, May 5. The season this year will be shorter than usual, only seven weeks, the final concert being on Saturday evening, June 20.

Mr Strube will be the first conductor in the series, and later on Mr Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, will conduct. Mr Strube is well known to the patrons of the Pops, and a great favorite with them. Mr Kautzenbach is one of the cellists in the orchestra, and has had considerable experience conducting similar concerts in Germany. Full announcement regarding the season will be made later.

SUN,

New York City.

.C 1908

THE MEMORIES OF A SEASON

THERE WAS MUSIC OTHER THAN OPERA.

Damrosch and Beethoven in Town—Bach Occasionally Heard From—Mary Garden Has a "Salome" Surprise Waiting for Her in the Dance.

Now that the season of music is over and its memories are being laid away amid the musty records of a more or less glorious past, only to be dragged forth when future generations of question askers harry critics yet unborn, let us confess that outside of the Hammersteinian field it was not a winter made extra glorious by any summer sun of York or Boston or Pittsburg. It was a poor and thin and watery season, in which a few notable incidents stood forth like the carmine clouds upon a dull December sunset.

Yet there was ground for encouragement. Despite the staggering power of the blows dealt by singer worship to all honest taste in music there was one splendid triumph for an old master, and this victory came through the agency of a local musical organization. This renders it all the more a source of pride. New York musicians and New York music lovers united in paying such a tribute to the genius of Beethoven as even Wagner himself would have been proud to enjoy in the heyday of his popularity.

Walter Damrosch once again disclosed that insight into the true conditions of musical feeling in this community which has on several previous occasions helped to win for him a reputation as a keen business man. Most people would have been willing to wager substantial sums of money that the Beethoven cycle would prove to be a dismal failure. Mr. Damrosch evidently did not think it would, or he would not have arranged it.

The results justified his enterprise. The orchestra gained in distinction and finished the series with the chief honors. The soloists were of the most ordinary type and their presence cannot be said to have provided a sensational element of interest. The fact is indisputable that it was the music of Beethoven which absorbed the attention of six large audiences, and this fact has a pregnant significance which cannot escape the most careless chronicler of musical incidents.

The concert season began with some loudly heralded débuts. Solo performers who were to astonish and move us came. They failed to astonish and they succeeded in moving people only out of the hall. At the same time two old friends, Josef Hofmann and Ignace Paderewski, demonstrated that they were still treading the aerial paths high along the mountain slopes of celestial art.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town on November 7 and we had the discomfort of listening to the ninth symphony of Bruckner, which left most of us in a troubled state of mind. Here again let us pause to note the pithy fact that Dr. Muck had no hesitation in offering some programmes which did not call for the services of soloists and that such entertainments were received by local music lovers with plentiful evidence of favor.

Early in the season Fritz Kreisler returned with his classic violin and played music of old masters in a style which delighted connoisseurs of the fiddle repertory. Here again were shown signs of an excellent condition of taste among the real music lovers of the city. The days of fiddle fireworks have passed. Such festivals are now left to the Sunday night concert at the Hippodrome. One hears less and less of Vieuxtemps and more of Tartini, Locatelli and other classic purists. The cultivated spirit rejoices and Mr. Kreisler is honored in the land.

The Russian Symphony Society began its series at Carnegie Hall on November 14 and continued throughout the season to play resolutely the latest products of the orchestral manufacturers of the Czar. It would be idle to enter into any serious comment on the season's labors of Modest Altschuler and his musicians. The total output of their series contained almost nothing of solid value. In the presentation of novelties this society surpassed the industry of any other organization in the city, but it may reasonably be doubted that more than one or two of these novelties will ever be heard here again.

Frank Damrosch's orchestral concerts for young people began on November 16 and had a season of large prosperity. The plan of making these concerts strictly educational has proved highly successful...

...constitution of musical art and endeavoring to acquire a rational basis for the formation of their likes and dislikes.

Sam Franko's concerts of old music continued and were accorded a fair measure of public approval. If Mr. Franko has accomplished nothing else, he has, at any rate, shown that the conductors of the established orchestras do not spend much time or effort in searching among the works of the old masters. When the public declares that the productions of contemporaneous composers are as poppy and mandragora, the routine conductor falls back on Mozart's G minor, Schubert's unfinished or Beethoven's fifth and publishes sorrowful assertions that there is nothing else to play.

But Mr. Franko has dragged down from the shelves of libraries such interesting compositions as the concerto of Conrad Hurlebusch for two pianos and orchestra, performed at the first concert of this last season. Mr. Franko has brought forward other delightful novelties out of the treasury of the forgotten past. It is a pity that some of these are not introduced into the repertories of the leading orchestras.

The reorganized Kneisel Quartet revealed itself here on December 3 and instantly claimed a place in popular affection. It is a fine little musical aristocracy that attends the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet. Not the least interesting fact about it is that it contains very few, if any, of those famous and much advertised patrons of musical art whose activities are confined to the two opera houses and the society columns of the newspapers.

The musical aristocracy of New York is in one sense exclusive, and in another it is not. There is no active exclusion of these society people. They are excluded merely by their own want of that last elevation of taste required for the enjoyment of such music as is provided by the Kneisel Quartet.

And then there are no boxes in Mendelssohn Hall. Fortunately for the society persons these will be provided at Herman Klein's Sunday concerts in the new German Theatre.

The Oratorio Society began its season on December 4, producing Wolf-Ferrari's cantata, "La Vita Nuova." It will be recalled that this work proved to be one of the most original and beautiful compositions of its kind given in this city in recent years. It is probable that the society will repeat it next season. It certainly ought to be heard again. The Oratorio Society's activities for the winter included the customary performances of "The Messiah" and a performance of the greatest of all oratorios, Bach's "St. Matthew Passion."

Not the least pleasing and artistic entertainment of this busy season was the piano and harpsichord concert given at Mendelssohn Hall by Arthur Whiting on December 11. The rehabilitation of the harpsichord is interesting and the effect of the music written for it is charming. Nevertheless the thoughtful hearer will hardly avoid noting that this same music gains something when played on the modern piano. Latent qualities, which we must admit the composers did not imagine, are brought out by the rich and sustained tone of the modern piano, while on the other hand a certain piquant fancy and modest tenderness of the music are heard only when it is sung by the gentle voiced harpsichord.

Mr. Whiting used the harpsichord again in a Flonzaley Quartet music concert, playing it in a work of Bach for this instrument and two violins. But this experiment was by no means as successful as the other. The acoustic properties of Mendelssohn Hall brought out in full sonority the tone of the two violins, which quite overpowered that of the keyboard instrument. The balance of the music, designed by Bach for performance in a much smaller chamber, was quite destroyed.

This fact gives support to the efforts so often made to readjust the instrumental forces of old works to the conditions of the modern concert hall. Such efforts must necessarily have strong argument in their favor when they are used in regard to works written before the public concert was known, as is the case with all of Bach's compositions.

It is worthy of a passing note that Mr. Whiting plays on harpsichords recently made and that a prominent piano house has recommended the manufacture of these instruments. It would be interesting to know whence comes the demand for them and how it originated.

Mr. Kneisel and his associates introduced Bach's G minor quartet at the concert of January 7. The work had been heard in 1904, but was undoubtedly new to many of its hearers. It was well worth a repetition. On January 9 Dr. Muck and the Bostonian musicians handed us Bischoff's E major symphony, of which a famous Brooklyn pianist said: "It has in it everything but music." Dr. Muck mused over the New York criticisms of this long and deeply involved composition and said: "I think these gentlemen are mistaken."

Perhaps. It is common for critics to be mistaken. But THE SUN'S commentator, for one, would rather wallow in the helpless gloom of a dead past along with old Bach and Beethoven than be enlightened by Bischoff. And that will be about all on that subject.

Walter Damrosch produced D'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountains" on January 18, but the snows refused to melt. The music was too subtle for the common New York mind. Mr. Damrosch tried another experiment on February 1 when he gave Tschaikowsky's "Eugène Onégin" in concert form. It was mortal hard on Tschaikowsky. Some people liked it, especially the waltz, which was more beautiful than those of "The Merry Widow" or "The Waltz...

...Every one had a short season of delight when the Boston Orchestra brought to town on February 20 Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by Hiller. Such a fugue! It was the maddest, merriest fugue of all the glad new year. It refashioned a good many people's notions of fugues, especially those who recalled that dreadful one of which Lazarus was ill in Dom Perosi's oratorio, or that other which troubled the analytical spirit of Mr. Strauss's Zarathustra.

In the same visit the Boston men played George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and made us all glad that an American still lived who was not afraid to write tunes after the manner of the fathers, and who had not bowed before the whole tone scale or the eternally suspended cadence.

Again on March 19 it was the Boston Orchestra that brought gifts. This time we heard Converse's "Jean of Arc" and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." These were two interesting novelties, though at least one of them did not make a profound impression, as it had been expected to do. A quartet by one Caetani, performed by the Kneisel organization, was the only other incident of the season that calls now for especial mention.

Naturally the production of novelties offers to the newspaper commentator the best opportunity for fresh and stimulating discussion; but it is not necessarily a proof of the value of a musical season. When all is said and done serious music lovers will probably agree that the best work in the direction of solidifying public taste was accomplished by Mr. Damrosch's Beethoven concerts, just as years ago Dr. Von Bülow's Beethoven piano recitals awakened a profound interest in the great sonatas and opened their treasures to hundreds.

It will be strange if the success of these concerts does not suggest to musical projectors the value of making similar excursions into the works of other masters. The sporadic performance of compositions can never arouse the same amount of interest as the assembling of several creation of a master mind in programmes upon which special attention can be focussed. To be sure only a few great masters can stand the test of a series of performances, for monotony would be certain in the cases of many.

But something can be done, and it is essential that something should be done to distract the mind from the continual worship of opera singers. The blind faith of the uncultivated lover of music that whatever an opera singer does must be good simply because he gets such a large salary ought to be combated in some way, and the force with which to combat it is the orchestra, for orchestral music places the purely personal element in performance as far in the background as it can be placed. Special programmes of composers compel the auditors to think about the music and the master who created it rather than about those who play it. Therefore these concerts are beneficial. Let us have more of them.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

From Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date APR 26 1908

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston on May 1 and 2 respectively. He will take leave with the same programme he used at his first appearance in October, 1906—Beethoven's C minor symphony and a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. It is an interesting coincidence that on April 23 this year the orchestra is giving a concert in aid of the fund which is being raised for the benefit of the sufferers of the Chelsea (Mass.) fire. Dr. Muck will conduct. On April 26, 1906, a similar concert was given in aid of the San Francisco sufferers. Had Symphony Hall not been in use for another concert on Sunday evening, the 28th, this concert would have been given on the corresponding Sunday of the other one.

...rk,

...1884

DR. KARL MUCK ends his engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the final Boston concerts of that organization May 1 and 2. For the programme Dr. Muck has chosen to repeat the programme with which he made his début with the orchestra a year ago last October—Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyl," and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

[192]

YORK PRESS

APR 27 1908

SONGS AND SING...

Conviction that Dr. Muck again was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after next season, was expressed by August Spanuth in a letter from Berlin printed in yesterday's Staats-Zeitung. "The fact that Muck's name has not even been considered," wrote Spanuth, "in the selection of Nikisch Weingartner's successor as director of the Royal Symphony concerts proves definitely, it seems to me, that he will return in a year to his Boston post. He is certainly his successor in Boston, for he, in Hamburg, cannot leave his Hamburg position for more than a year. Surely it is not to be supposed the Boston management would have been satisfied with a one-year engagement had it not been sure of the man who would succeed Fiedler. I am not a betting man; but I should be willing to stake something on Muck's return to Boston."

Let us hope Spanuth's deduction is correct. It seems a plausible one, all the more so if one considers how the engagement of Fiedler came about. When the new man had been chosen official announcement was made that he was a personal friend of Muck, and that Muck had used his influence in Fiedler's favor. Now, it is known generally that Muck aroused the ire of many well-meaning dwellers in Boston by devoting his programmes in large part to novelties of extremely modern tendencies. These good persons, as Philip Hale says in the May number of the New Music Review, found "comfort and also waste pipe for their intellect by writing letters of remonstrance for the yawning columns of the Transcript." Fiedler, however, fought a similar fight in Hamburg when he first took up the director's baton, and there, as in Boston, the conservative element raised a hue and cry. It is probable the new conductor will continue in his predecessor's footsteps, so that Muck, if he returns, will find his principles still intact. It seems quite likely Muck had that in mind when he recommended Fiedler.

H. T. Parker, critic of the Boston Transcript, does not place Muck in the highest rank of orchestral conductors; but we are glad to see he lends his support in the programme controversy, taking the director's side as opposed to the Philistine grumblers. Parker points out that in his two years in Boston Dr. Muck "has held the numerical balance almost exactly even between the accepted classics, ancient and modern, and untried, neglected or novel pieces." Moreover, Parker shows that "as a mere matter of count Dr. Muck has performed forty-three compositions new to Boston in the past two seasons," whereas Gericke, in the last two years of his conductorship, performed thirty-eight new works, "or five less than Dr. Muck has ventured—a trifling discrepancy, due probably as much to chance circumstance as to any deliberate conservatism." As to the charge that Dr. Muck "crammed his new music down the throats of his audiences," an assertion made because the conductor repeated in one season Strauss's "Domestic Symphony," Debussy's "Sea Pieces" and Bischoff's symphony, Parker shows that in the last year of Gericke's regime there were two performances of a new symphony by Mahler and in the previous season two performances of Cesar Franck's symphony. "The truth is," says Parker, "that unless the dispute starts from the promise that much more than half the music played at the symphony concerts in a single year should be familiar pieces, classic or modern, the advantage of facts and figures is clearly on Dr. Muck's side and on the side of those that uphold him."

Of the two musical parties, the conservative and the advanced, the latter is by far the most generous, asserts Parker. Of its adherents he says: "They love the classics; they hear them gladly and with no less pleasure than they draw from the music of their own immediate time; they need even the minor classics, wherein the giants nodded, and they would not abate the place that established music always has had and always will have in the scheme of our concerts. Cheerfully they will agree that it is one of the chief duties of our orchestra and our conductors to keep the classics, older and younger, steadily before the ears of their audiences in as perfect and life-giving performance as is possible. It is the other side that will not agree that the orchestra, its conductors and its public have an equal duty toward the music of their own generation."

"What would we say of a public or a private library," the Transcript writer continues, "that excluded the newer books or the books that departed from accepted literary traditions? What should we think of readers who clamored that they should be so excluded or who reproached the librarian that had put them on his shelves? What would be our instinctive estimate of the literary breadth of view or curiosity of those who declined to open them? ... pose the picture galleries that ... private possessions to gratify ... tastes declined all the pictures of ... time, and suppose that visitors ... look at such pictures or looked ... with disdainful eyes? Music is ... the arts; it has the same ... change and growth, innovation ... riety as the others. ... those in plenty to whom impressionistic characterising pictures give no ... which, of course, is a par...

Pop Concerts.

With the end of the season of Symphony concerts next Saturday night comes the annual series of Pop concerts at Symphony hall, and the opening will be Tuesday night, May 5. The season this year will be shorter than usual, only seven weeks, the final concert being on Saturday evening, June 20.

Mr Strube will be the first conductor in the series, and later on Mr Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, will conduct. Mr Strube is well known to the patrons of the Pops, and a great favorite with them. Mr Kautzenbach is one of the cellists in the orchestra, and has had considerable experience conducting similar concerts in Germany. Full announcement regarding the season will be made later.

SUN,

New York City.

THE MEMORIES OF A SEASON

THERE WAS MUSIC OTHER THAN OPERA.

Damrosch and Beethoven in Town—Bach Occasionally Heard From—Mary Garden Has a "Salome" Surprise Waiting for Her in the Dance.

Now that the season of music is over and its memories are being laid away amid the musty records of a more or less glorious past, only to be dragged forth when future generations of question askers harry critics yet unborn, let us confess that outside of the Hammersteinian field it was not a winter made extra glorious by any summer sun of York or Boston or Pittsburg. It was a poor and thin and watery season, in which a few notable incidents stood forth like the carmine clouds upon a dull December sunset.

Yet there was ground for encouragement. Despite the staggering power of the blows dealt by singer worship to all honest taste in music there was one splendid triumph for an old master, and this victory came through the agency of a local musical organization. This renders it all the more a source of pride. New York musicians and New York music lovers united in paying such a tribute to the genius of Beethoven as even Wagner himself would have been proud to enjoy in the heyday of his popularity.

Walter Damrosch once again disclosed that insight into the true conditions of musical feeling in this community which has on several previous occasions helped to win for him a reputation as a keen business man. Most people would have been willing to wager substantial sums of money that the Beethoven cycle would prove to be a dismal failure. Mr. Damrosch evidently did not think it would, or he would not have arranged it.

The results justified his enterprise. The orchestra gained in distinction and finished the series with the chief honors. The soloists were of the most ordinary type and their presence cannot be said to have provided a sensational element of interest. The fact is indisputable that it was the music of Beethoven which absorbed the attention of six large audiences, and this fact has a pregnant significance which cannot escape the most careless chronicler of musical incidents.

The concert season began with some loudly heralded debuts. Solo performers who were to astonish and move us came. They failed to astonish and they succeeded in moving people only out of the hall. At the same time two old friends, Josef Hofmann and Ignace Paderewski, demonstrated that they were still treading the aerial paths high along the mountain slopes of celestial art.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town on November 7 and we had the discomfort of listening to the ninth symphony of Bruckner, which left most of us in a troubled state of mind. Here again let us pause to note the pithy fact that Dr. Muck had no hesitation in offering some programmes which did not call for the services of soloists and that such entertainments were received by local music lovers with plentiful evidence of favor.

Early in the season Fritz Kreisler returned with his classic violin and played music of old masters in a style which delighted connoisseurs of the fiddle repertory. Here again were shown signs of an excellent condition of taste among the real music lovers of the city. The days of fiddle fireworks have passed. Such festivals are now left to the Sunday night concert at the Hippodrome. One hears less and less of Vieuxtemps and more of Tartini, Locatelli and other classic purists. The cultivated spirit rejoices and Mr. Kreisler is honored in the land.

The Russian Symphony Society began its series at Carnegie Hall on November 14 and continued throughout the season to play resolutely the latest products of the orchestral manufacturers of the Czar. It would be idle to enter into any serious comment on the season's labors of Modest Altschuler and his musicians. The total output of their series contained almost nothing of solid value. In the presentation of novelties this society surpassed the industry of any other organization in the city, but it may reasonably be doubted that more than one or two of these novelties will ever be heard here again.

Frank Damrosch's orchestral concerts for young people began on November 16 and had a season of large prosperity. The plan of making these concerts strictly educational has proved highly successful.

[illegible] which goes to show that some people are still trying to find out the constitution of musical art and endeavoring to acquire a rational basis for the formation of their likes and dislikes.

Sam Franko's concerts of old music continued and were accorded a fair measure of public approval. If Mr. Franko has accomplished nothing else, he has, at any rate, shown that the conductors of the established orchestras do not spend much time or effort in searching among the works of the old masters. When the public declares that the productions of contemporaneous composers are as poppy and mandragora, the routine conductor falls back on Mozart's G minor, Schubert's unfinished or Beethoven's fifth and publishes sorrowful assertions that there is nothing else to play.

But Mr. Franko has dragged down from the shelves of libraries such interesting compositions as the concerto of Conrad Hurlebusch for two pianos and orchestra, performed at the first concert of this last season. Mr. Franko has brought forward other delightful novelties out of the treasury of the forgotten past. It is a pity that some of these are not introduced into the repertories of the leading orchestras.

The reorganized Kneisel Quartet revealed itself here on December 3 and instantly claimed a place in popular affection. It is a fine little musical aristocracy that attends the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet. Not the least interesting fact about it is that it contains very few, if any, of those famous and much advertised patrons of musical art whose activities are confined to the two opera houses and the society columns of the newspapers.

The musical aristocracy of New York is in one sense exclusive, and in another it is not. There is no active exclusion of these society people. They are excluded merely by their own want of that last elevation of taste required for the enjoyment of such music as is provided by the Kneisel Quartet.

And then there are no boxes in Mendelssohn Hall. Fortunately for the society persons these will be provided at Herman Klein's Sunday concerts in the new German Theatre.

The Oratorio Society began its season on December 4, producing Wolf-Ferrari's cantata, "La Vita Nuova." It will be recalled that this work proved to be one of the most original and beautiful compositions of its kind given in this city in recent years. It is probable that the society will repeat it next season. It certainly ought to be heard again. The Oratorio Society's activities for the winter included the customary performances of "The Messiah" and a performance of the greatest of all oratorios, Bach's "St. Matthew Passion."

Not the least pleasing and artistic entertainment of this busy season was the piano and harpsichord concert given at Mendelssohn Hall by Arthur Whiting on December 11. The rehabilitation of the harpsichord is interesting and the effect of the music written for it is charming. Nevertheless the thoughtful hearer will hardly avoid noting that this same music gains something when played on the modern piano. Latent qualities, which we must admit the composers did not imagine, are brought out by the rich and sustained tone of the modern piano, while on the other hand a certain piquant fancy and modest tenderness of the music are heard only when it is sung by the gentle voiced harpsichord.

Mr. Whiting used the harpsichord again in a Flonzaley Quartet music concert, playing it in a work of Bach for this instrument and two violins. But this experiment was by no means as successful as the other. The acoustic properties of Mendelssohn Hall brought out in full sonority the tone of the two violins, which quite overpowered that of the keyboard instrument. The balance of the music, designed by Bach for performance in a much smaller chamber, was quite destroyed.

This fact gives support to the efforts so often made to readjust the instrumental forces of old works to the conditions of the modern concert hall. Such efforts must necessarily have strong argument in their favor when they are used in regard to works written before the public concert was known, as is the case with all of Bach's compositions.

It is worthy of a passing note that Mr. Whiting plays on harpsichords recently made and that a prominent piano house has recommended the manufacture of these instruments. It would be interesting to know whence comes the demand for them and how it originated.

Mr. Kneisel and his associates introduced Bach's G minor quartet at the concert of January 7. The work had been heard in 1904, but was undoubtedly new to many of its hearers. It was well worth a repetition. On January 9 Dr. Muck and the Bostonian musicians handed us Bischoff's E major symphony, of which a famous Brooklyn pianist said: "It has in it everything but music." Dr. Muck mused over the New York criticisms of this long and deeply involved composition and said: "I think these gentlemen are mistaken."

Perhaps. It is common for critics to be mistaken. But THE SUN'S commentator, for one, would rather wallow in the helpless gloom of a dead past along with old Bach and Beethoven than be enlightened by Bischoff. And that will be about all on that subject.

Walter Damrosch produced D'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountains" on January 18, but the snows refused to melt. The music was too subtle for the common New York mind. Mr. Damrosch tried another experiment on February 1 when he gave Tschaikowsky's "Eugène Onégin" in concert form. It was mortal hard on Tschaikowsky. Some people liked it, especially the waltz, which was more beautiful than those of "The Merry Widow" or "The Waltz Dream." It is a moral certainty that at [illegible] is safely out of the way some comic opera [illegible] will steal that waltz and build an operetta around it. Oh, for an hour of Donald Brian then!

Every one had a short season of delight when the Boston Orchestra brought to town on February 20 Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by Hiller. Such a fugue! It was the maddest, merriest fugue of all the glad new year. It refashioned a good many people's notions of fugues, especially those who recalled that dreadful one of which Lazarus was ill in Dom Perosi's oratorio, or that other which troubled the analytical spirit of Mr. Strauss's Zarathustra.

In the same visit the Boston men played George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and made us all glad that an American still lived who was not afraid to write tunes after the manner of the fathers, and who had not bowed before the whole tone scale or the eternally suspended cadence.

Again on March 19 it was the Boston Orchestra that brought gifts. This time we heard Converse's "Joan of Arc" and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." These were two interesting novelties, though at least one of them did not make a profound impression, as it had been expected to do. A quartet by one Caetani, performed by the Kneisel organization, was the only other incident of the season that calls now for especial mention.

Naturally the production of novelties offers to the newspaper commentator the best opportunity for fresh and stimulating discussion; but it is not necessarily a proof of the value of a musical season. When all is said and done serious music lovers will probably agree that the best work in the direction of solidifying public taste was accomplished by Mr. Damrosch's Beethoven concerts, just as years ago Dr. Von Bülow's Beethoven piano recitals awakened a profound interest in the great sonatas and opened their treasures to hundreds.

It will be strange if the success of these concerts does not suggest to musical projectors the value of making similar excursions into the works of other masters. The sporadic performance of compositions can never arouse the same amount of interest as the assembling of several creation of a master mind in programmes upon which special attention can be focussed. To be sure only a few great masters can stand the test of a series of performances, for monotony would be certain in the cases of many.

But something can be done, and it is essential that something should be done to distract the mind from the continual worship of opera singers. The blind faith of the uncultivated lover of music that whatever an opera singer does must be good simply because he gets such a large salary ought to be combated in some way, and the force with which to combat it is the orchestra, for orchestral music places the purely personal element in performance as far in the background as it can be placed. Special programmes of composers compel the auditors to think about the music and the master who created it rather than about those who play it. Therefore these concerts are beneficial. Let us have more of them.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

From Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date APR 26 1908

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston on May 1 and 2 respectively. He will take leave with the same programme he used at his first appearance in October, 1906—Beethoven's C minor symphony and a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. It is an interesting coincidence that on April 29 this year the orchestra is giving a concert in aid of the fund which is being raised for the benefit of the sufferers of the Chelsea (Mass.) fire. Dr. Muck will conduct. On April 26, 1906, a similar concert was given in aid of the San Francisco sufferers. Had Symphony Hall not been in use for another concert on Sunday evening, the 28th, this concert would have been given on the corresponding Sunday of the other one.

---

om GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

ddress

ate APR 24 1908

DR. KARL MUCK ends his engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the final Boston concerts of that organization May 1 and 2. For the programme Dr. Muck has chosen to repeat the programme with which he made his début with the orchestra a year ago last October—Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyl," and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

[192]

NEW YORK PRESS

APR 27 1908

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Conviction that Dr. Muck again would be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after next season, was expressed by August Spanuth in a letter from Berlin printed in yesterday's Staats-Zeitung. "The fact that Dr. Muck's name has not even been considered," wrote Spanuth, "in the selection of Felix Weingartner's successor as conductor of the Royal Symphony concerts shows definitely, it seems to me, that he will return in a year to his Boston post. Certainly his successor in Boston, Fiedler of Hamburg, cannot leave his Hamburg position for more than a year. Surely it is not to be supposed the Boston management would have been satisfied with a one-year engagement had it not been sure of the man who would succeed Fiedler. I am not a betting man; but I should be willing to stake something on Muck's return to Boston."

Let us hope Spanuth's deduction is correct. It seems a plausible one, all the more so if one considers how the engagement of Fiedler came about. When the new man had been chosen official announcement was made that he was a personal friend of Muck, and that Muck had used his influence in Fiedler's favor. Now, it is known generally that Muck aroused the ire of many well-meaning dwellers in Boston by devoting his programmes in large part to novelties of extremely modern tendencies. These good persons, as Philip Hale says in the May number of the New Music Review, found "comfort and also waste pipe for their intellect by writing letters of remonstrance for the yawning columns of the Transcript." Fiedler, however, fought a similar fight in Hamburg when he first took up the director's baton, and there, as in Boston, the conservative element raised a hue and cry. It is probable the new conductor will continue in his predecessor's footsteps, so that Muck, if he returns, will find his principles still intact. It seems quite likely Muck had that in mind when he recommended Fiedler.

H. T. Parker, critic of the Boston Transcript, does not place Muck in the highest rank of orchestral conductors; but we are glad to see he lends his support in the programme controversy, taking the director's side as opposed to the Philistine grumblers. Parker points out that in his two years in Boston Dr. Muck "has held the numerical balance almost exactly even between the accepted classics, ancient and modern, and untried, neglected or novel pieces." Moreover, Parker shows that "as a mere matter of count Dr. Muck has performed forty-three compositions new to Boston in the past two seasons," whereas Gericke, in the last two years of his conductorship, performed thirty-eight new works, "or five less than Dr. Muck has ventured—a trifling discrepancy, due probably as much to chance circumstance as to any deliberate 'conservatism'." As to the charge that Dr. Muck "crammed his new music down the throats of his audiences," an assertion made because the conductor repeated in one season Strauss's "Domestic Symphony," Debussy's "Sea Pieces" and Bischoff's symphony, Parker shows that in the last year of Gericke's regime there were two performances of a new symphony by Mahler and in the previous season two performances of Cesar Franck's symphony. "The truth is," says Parker, "that unless the dispute starts from the premise that much more than half the music played at the symphony concerts in a single year should be familiar pieces, classic or modern, the advantage of facts and figures is clearly on Dr. Muck's side and on the side of those that uphold him."

Of the two musical parties, the conservative and the advanced, the latter is by far the most generous, asserts Parker. Of its adherents he says: "They love the classics; they hear them gladly and with no less pleasure than they draw from the music of their own immediate time; they heed even the minor classics, wherein the giants nodded, and they would not abate the place that established music always has had and always will have in the scheme of our concerts. Cheerfully they will agree that it is one of the chief duties of our orchestra and our conductors to keep the classics, elder and younger, steadily before the ears of their audiences in as perfect and life-giving performance as is possible. It is the other side that will not agree that the orchestra, its conductors and its public have an equal duty toward the music of their own generation."

"What would we say of a public or a private library," the Transcript writer continues, "that excluded the newer books or the books that departed from accepted literary traditions? What should we think of readers who clamored that they should be so excluded or who reproached the librarian that had put them on his shelves? What would be our instinctive estimate of the literary breadth of view or curiosity of those who declined to open them? Suppose the picture galleries that were not private possessions to gratify individual tastes declined all the pictures of our own time, and suppose that visitors refused to look at such pictures or looked at them with disdainful eyes? Music is only one of the arts; it has the same privilege of change and growth, innovation and variety as the others. * * * There are those in plenty to whom impressionist or characterizing pictures give no pleasure, which, of course, is a personal matter. Yet they do not contend that all such pictures should be packed away in the [illegible]

1884

...s sound to ...

...t is always risky to seek analogies be... the arts, and Parker has not ... avoided the dangers it presents. ... compares a library to a concert hall; ... puts a picture gallery in the same ... Yet the subscribers to a series of ... phony concerts are in an entirely dif... position from the subscribers to a ... library or the visitors to a gal... The first class has no choice. The ... programme is served out after the manner ... a menu at a table d'hote dinner. Readers, ... the other hand, may exert their liberty ... taste, may pick out the books they like ... They may skim a novel hurriedly; ... may read one or two chapters and ... throw the work aside; they may read the ... chapter first and the first chapter last. ... also the visitor in a picture gallery ... may devote an hour to one canvas, a ... minute to another, a second to a third, as ... fancy dictates. That there are pic... he dislikes need not bother him. ... may spend his entire time looking at ... he does like. He may shut out the ... of the works that offend his feel... by turning his back upon them. But ... unfortunate subscriber to concerts ... sometimes is compelled to listen to music ... he hates. To be sure, he may leave ... room, though departures of this sort ... generally are censured severely by press ... public. But in doing this he forfeits ... something for which he has paid and gets ... nothing in return. He is not in the posi... of the reader, who may change one ... for another, or the picture-... who may suit his taste or mood. ... Parker compared the symphony ... concerts to a series of lectures or readings ... would have created a closer analogy. ... subscribers to a course of read... would be as divided in their opinions ... the Boston Symphony audiences and ... as wrought up if they found that ... works chosen for reading were not to ... liking.

Yet Parker is perfectly right in the prin... for which he contends, and the lesson ... is one that New Yorkers even more than ... Bostonians should take to heart. The ... root of the trouble lies in the fact that ... Americans are not yet as cultivated in ... music as they are in the other arts. The ... man of literary instincts takes an interest ... in all important contributions to literature, ... whether they please his palate or not. ... The connoisseur in delineative art has an ... open eye for all that is new, even if it ... conflicts with his personal ideas. But the ... great majority of concertgoers in this ... country have not reached the point where ... intellectual satisfaction is gained from ... works that find no responsive emotional ... chord. To quote Parker's description of ... Muck's opponents, "They like to hear—... what they like to hear, and they are re... of all else." Surely that's not only ... "a narrow and selfish view," but one that ... is not worthy of any man or woman pro... music, not to say general culture.

MAX SMITH.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
APR 26 1908

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with ... the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the ... public rehearsal and concert in Boston on ... May 1 and 2, respectively. He will take ... leave with the programme he used at his ... first appearance there in October, 1906. ... It is Beethoven's C minor symphony and ... the "Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" ... and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of ... Nuremberg" of Wagner.

HERALD APRIL 28, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR CHELSEA RELIEF HAS LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Harold Bauer, pianist, gave a concert last evening in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the Chelsea relief fund. Dr. Muck conducted. This was the programme: Beethoven, overture, "Leonore" No. 3, piano concerto in E-flat major, No. 5; Chabrier, "Espana"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

Mr. Bauer and the orchestra gave their services and the entire receipts of the concert will be given to the fund. There was a very large audience, and many stood, for besides the opportunity to help out a cause in which the public is warmly interested, there was the opportunity to hear the orchestra, a privilege which many who do not hold season tickets are obliged almost wholly to forego. The few extra concerts that have been given since the establishment of the orchestra's pension fund have met with an immediate response from the public, gratifying both to the orchestra and to the city as a music-loving community. This was also the last opportunity for many of seeing Dr. Muck conduct.

The progmamme was suitably popular, and the performance was one of characteristic brilliance. Nothing could have given greater pleasure than this concerto played as it was by Mr. Bauer, with great power, with sympathy and with color. Nor could anything else quite have filled the place of Chabrier's Rhapsody, the performance of which by the Boston orchestra is familiar.

The audience was a festal one, and was keenly appreciative, not only of the high order of the performance, but of the readiness and generosity with which all the players had given their time and services to the cause. The applause was prolonged after each of the numbers, so that Mr. Bauer and Dr. Muck were repeatedly recalled. The latter called upon the orchestra to rise and acknowledge its share of [193]

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn. "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."
Schubert. Symphony without Kettledrums and Trumpets.
D'Indy. "Summer Day on the Mountain."

Mendelssohn, the melodic, suave, genteel Mendelssohn, held his own very well against the rest of the programme on Saturday. Part of the success of the overture was due to the noble reading of Dr. Muck, who made the picture of "Meeresstille" as graphic as Coleridge's description of being "as idle as a painted ship, upon a painted ocean." We were glad too that the misleading title of "Calm Sea" was changed into "Sea-calm,"—a very different thing. Goethe's picture (not as powerful as that of Coleridge) runs:—

"Deepest silence on the waters,
Without motion rests the sea,
And the sailor sees around him
Only flat monotony.

Not a breath of air is stirring,
Utter stillness, as the grave,
In the whole wide, vast horizon
Moveth not a single wave."

And this picture was given by the orchestra with a power that was phenomenal. No one could have mistaken that introduction (as has often been done) for a calm, smiling and pleasant sea.

The portrayal grows feebler when the boatswain blows his whistle, the sails are hoisted, and the ship ploughs its way onward. Here one wished for a Richard Strauss; yet the final blare of trumpets at "Land ho!" was exciting enough and was finely played.

The almost unknown Schubert symphony was scarcely worth resuscitating. It was a work intended for his little coterie of musical comrades to play at, and Schubert probably never dreamed of its elevation to the post of honor in a great orchestral concert. To have heard it in a parlor, given by talented amateurs, would have been a keen delight; but it scarcely sustained its place between its big neighbors on this occasion.

The first movement was clear as crystal, melodic and terse, but Dr. Muck magnified it into more dramatic power than we imagine Schubert intended. The second movement was one of those slow movements of "divine length," full of tenderness but also of repetitions. Had it come after the D'Indy composition it would have been a good poultice "to heal the wounds of sound." Alas, we have outgrown this kind of simplicity and the twentieth century is impatient of repetitions. If there is to be great length, as there was in this case, it must be filled with knotty problems and troublesome dissonances; it must give the mystical utterances of an oracle, not the innocent prattle of a child.

The Minuet and Trio was interesting. It was more virile than many of the minuets of Mozart or Haydn and it had more of the waltz than of the minuet spirit. It is interesting to note the transition from the Minuet into the Waltz in some of Schubert's Minuets. The rhythm was here marked 3-4, but the effect was very frequently 6-4, which is the true waltz rhythm, although the 3-4 rhythm is still invariably marked upon the Waltz also.

The Finale had little to say for itself but was one of the light-hearted endings with which Mozart and Haydn ended their cycle forms—a rather bad legacy from the Gigue of the Suite. Not even the good playing of the orchestra and the sharp contrasts and hearty virility which Dr. Muck read into the work could make it a true symphonic number, it remains a pretty symphony for amateurs, a striking contrast to the glory of the C major symphony by the same composer.

It is related that the philosoper Kant was once approached by some students and questioned as to the meaning of one of his involved sentences. He read and re-read the sentence and finally said: "I cannot now recall just what I meant here, but it is a very important sentence and you would do well to devote yourselves to its thorough study!" We should like to question D'Indy as to the meaning of very many sentences in his Symphonic Trouble entitled "Summer day on the Mountain."

We do not need to tell those familiar with modern musical radicals that the score was very long, that it had many hitheto unheard-of progressions, that it called for all possible instruments. All possible instruments, except factory-whistles, have been used by the modern composer. But there is one instrument employed here that makes its marked effect in the score—the piano-forte. This instrument has been used as an orchestral tone-color as long ago as Berlioz, who used it, four-handed, in his Tempest Fantasie to picture the surging of billows. D'Indy brings out some strong effects with this piano tone-color and, in fact, all the tone-coloring of this work is powerful and masterly.

But this field of orchestral technique is just now in its finest flower. Where, 70 years ago, the world possessed one Berlioz, (who was considered absurdly extravagant in his orchestral demands), it now has a dozen. Berlioz, Wagner and Liszt are left behind by the bold experimenters of the present.

But the content of the work was also striking at times. The first movement seemed the most comprehensible and poetic. It carried out the same idea that Mascagni exploited in his Sunrise, in "Iris," and in the same general manner. It began with a terrifically extended crescendo ("Pochissimo a pochissimo") starting from almost inaudibility. Few orchestras could have played this crescendo as it was performed at this concert. Few conductors could have read the movement as impressively as Dr. Muck did on this occasion.

The second movement, "Afternoon under the Pines," was something that must have puzzled every thinking auditor. It was a portrayal of moods and of changes of moods. What with Debussy's afternoon of the Faun and D'Indy's afternoon of the mountaineer, we should advise French composers to distrust their muse after 12 o'clock. There were good melodic thoughts presented in a fragmentary manner, there was an abundance of ingenious figure treatment. Thus much was clear if the auditor would busy himself in piecing it together—and it was worth while for it was a good example of modern intellectuality.

But there were other points as mystical as Delphic utterances. Why did the rustic melody develop into fury? Why were there mutterings of a tempest on a peaceful afternoon? Why the roll of the kettle-drum and ...

mood? Was Napoleon crossing the Alps?

Then came "Night" with an impressive suggestion of distant bells. In the midst of all this tranquillity came a sudden crash. This might mean anything. The bed breaking down? Burglars? An alarm clock going off at the wrong hour? We do not know.

There was some splendid harp work and an actual melody for the horn! But the oboe bit off the last end of this. In spite of all the intentional mystifications of this work we found some strength in it. It may be that we shall yet become inured to successions of dissonances. They may have their meaning, as the Bohemian sentence (all consonants, as the modern works are sometimes all dissonance),—"Strz prst skrz krk"—has its meaning to those who speak the language. At present we do not speak this language and we only dimly comprehend it. We wish that there were more of absolute beauty to it. We think part of its fogginess needless and possibly affected. Yet we would gladly sit through this work again to study the good points which it undoubtedly has and to see if we could unravel some more of it. Music has become mighty hard work for conductors, musicians, critics and auditors in these days. Louis C. Elson.

APRIL 27, 1908
TRANSCRIPT,

MUSIC AND DRAMA

D'INDY'S NEW PIECE AT A SECOND HEARING

The Illuminating and Sympathetic Performance That Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Gave It—The Qualities That Set Mr. d'Indy Apart from the Composers of the Hour and Their Play in the "Symphonic Pictures"—The New Freedom and the New Humanity of the Music—The Week-End Concerts—The Same Old Bernhardt in the Same Old Sort of Play—News of New Plays and Departing Singers

Mr. d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, renewed and heightened every impression that it had made on Friday. It came, as well, to still more illuminating, sympathetic and communicating performance. The music asks tonal magnificence when it pictures the dawn and speaks with the emotions of the daybreak, catching each momentary impression of the scene, quivering to the feeling the moment's stir in the solitary and poetically minded beholder, and then absorbing each detail of both into its own advancing flood of light and of passion. For Mr. d'Indy has written here with true passion for the awakening light and for the awakening world—for the daily miracle of the re-creation out of dark and stillness of the world of sun and man, as it may stir a lofty and abstracted spirit no less truly than twenty commoner emotions. Again, in the second "picture" of the revery under the pines of the mountain side, with the sounds of the valley and its life below jarring into it and stirring it anew, the music asks a quiet loyalliness and intensity of sustained tone that shall weave its own mood, into which the sounds of the external life shall break with the poetic and, in its finer sense, the dramatic significance that the composer designed. As it seemed to us there was no grotesqueness and little obscurity in the poetic content of the music as Dr. Muck and his men played it. They wrought d'Indy's picture. Again beauty of tone—the shadowed, mantling, soothing beauty that Mr. d'Indy seeks in much of his "picture" of the falling night—wrought the mood of his imagining. In a word Dr. Muck discovered and communicated the intrinsic beauty and poetry of the music. It is easy to play Mr. d'Indy's pieces so that they shall seem long and weary exercises in abstruse ideas, strange progressions, recondite orchestral timbres and laborious subtleties of musical thought and expression. Played to the letter, but not with the spirit, they seem to justify many of the reserves and reproaches of those who hear his music without pleasure, understanding or emotion. Then suddenly comes the illuminating performance, that enters into the exalted mind and the truly spiritualizing temperament of the composer; that feels the poetry that stirred in him, the beauty of idea and the loftiness of answering emotion that he would express, and straightway the music is eloquent with that beauty, poetry and feeling, and the means become only means, that justify themselves by what they achieve, that seem sometimes inevitable to the end. Such a performance Dr. Muck gave to the new "symphonic pictures." The listeners heard and felt the spirit, as well as the matter and the manner of Mr. d'Indy.

In this spirit, as it seems more and more to us, lies the peculiar appeal of Mr. d'Indy's music and the peculiar place he has now gained among the composers of our time. Debussy and his brethren would make the vague and the evanescent and the emotions that they stir, tangible. They are concerned with the fitful visions of the dreaming faun with the sea that is never still, with the flitting phantoms of the shadowy Allemonde where Pélléas and Mélisande dwelt and and died. Strauss and his followers would make philosophies and sensualities alternately audible in music with Zarathrusta or Salome. Or they would search broken minds like Don Quixote's or lusting souls like Electra's. Theirs is music of abnormal mental process applying itself to abnormal things. Puccini and his imitators of the opera house—and Mr. d'Indy writes operas as well as symphonic pieces, though we in America never hear them—are all for effective passion. They write passionately and they never forget their audience. Mr. d'Indy stands apart from all these and the other groups and tendencies of our musical time. The vague does not ... [illegible] ... effective stir ... large, and fine emotions. It ... detached and distilled essence of them. ... would search out the beauty and the power ... and the purity of this essence and then ex... press it in tones. Mr. d'Indy reflects upon ... spiritual things; they stir him to emo... tion as well; and most of all they quicken ... him to a kind of aspiration. Out of this ... thought that is so deep, out of this aspira... tion that is so pure, he would draw a music ... of new beauties and of new emotions that ... shall be above all a spiritual voice. He ... would restore music to the loftier and ... austerer beauty, to the purity and the no... bility of spirit that is in his master Franck, ... and that Franck in turn felt in many a ... page of Beethoven. Subtle and unusual, ... strange and irritating may be the means ... by which d'Indy would accomplish this pur... pose; he has made them a harmonic and an ... instrumental idiom evolved out of endless ... reflection and endless aspiration. Yet they ... gain his end for those who will understand ... and feel his goal and thereby are they justi... fied.

"In a Summer Day on the Mountain," as it seemed again on Saturday night, Mr. d'Indy has come closer than he has hitherto to this exalted and spiritualized ideal. In the second symphony the struggle was uppermost; the austerity of the process left the hearer cold; he appreciated the nobility of the ideal; he thrilled to the pursuit of it; but Mr. d'Indy did not quite lead him into the beauty that he sought and into the intensities of the emotion that the ideal awakened. There was too little human quality in the music. It did not quite summon the warmth of the ideal beauty that it sought; it did not quite communicate the emotion of it. The new piece escapes this seeming effort and austerity. It goes farther even than the symphony in recondite process—in the development and the relation of the melodies, in harmonies, in rhythm, in instrumental coloring, but they gain their end so completely that the hearer barely heeds them. They bring the beauty and they impart the emotion that they seek. Clearer, too, is the peculiar beauty, intensity and spiritual quality of Mr. d'Indy's melody. There is nothing common or sensuous in it; nothing that is either deliberately graphic or deliberately vague. It is the voice of the pure beauty that he seeks; it has in it, notably in the second and the third of the "pictures," the aspiring emotion that has stirred in him. It is intrinsically spiritual. His feeling has distilled it out of his thought.

The peculiar quality of this thought and feeling is its power to idealize. Orchestral dawns are nowadays almost a convention of delineative music. The youth of the conservatories make them from approved patterns. The wonder, the beauty and the power of Mr. d'Indy' dawn is not that his music makes it graphic, stirring from dimness and silence into the light and life of the awakening world. Mr. d'Indy does not write merely delineative music of a miracle of nature. He has written the music of the emotion and the poetry of the dawn in a high and solitary place and in as high and solitary exaltation of mood. It is the emotion that kindles in all of us, unless we are clods and dullards, in such a moment, place and mood that he has brought to expression. He has liberated its essence into his tones. He has spiritualized and idealized it in his thought. Not merely awakening earth and awakening life from valley to mountain top speak in the climax in which the "picture" ends. There is long-pent emotion, universal and human, in it as well.

And so again with the second "picture." Orchestral reveries are as old orchestral dawns; but not such idealizing reveries as this with its dream-atmosphere of soft clear light and air, and stirring and throbbing through it such a song of aspiration, of spiritualized and idealized longing. Again Mr. d'Indy has sublimated to poetry and to beauty and so released in tones true and deep and universal emotions. He has bound them to earth; for the valley and its life interrupt them; but out of this interruption springs the aspiration anew, the deeper and the warmer. Thus these jangling sounds have their poetic purpose. They keep the essential human quality of the whole tone-poem. It returns again in the joyous tumult of freedom from the day with which the picture of "night" begins. It softens as rest and shadow steal over the mountain and the valleys. And then it merges and vanishes in the music of calm, of stillness, of a soothing and all-enfolding darkness with which Mr. d'Indy ends. Again it is more than music of delineation. It is the music of the emotion of night, of its healing and its peace in a vast and soli... tary place, of the aspiration th... stilled itself in the universal ... In many a sense throughout ... piece, the mountain has releas... Mr. d'Indy and humanized him.

H. T. P.

Here in Boston

The "Pop" concerts, which begin a week from tomorrow at Symphony Hall, are to continue only seven weeks this year—through June 20, the Saturday after class day at Harvard. Experience has shown that their public dwindles quickly after the end of the academic year.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 26 1908

PROF. WILLY HESS, for three years the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has ... Boston ... concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the ... Royal Theater ... Stuttgart, returns ... at the ... of the present ...

...of Strauss, and they wonder respectfully why such pieces should be played."

It is always risky to seek analogies between the arts, and Parker has not wholly avoided the dangers it presents. He compares a library to a concert hall; he puts a picture gallery in the same class. Yet the subscribers to a series of symphony concerts are in an entirely different position from the subscribers to a public library or the visitors to a gallery. The first class has no choice. The programme is served out after the manner of a menu at a table d'hote dinner. Readers, on the other hand, may exert their liberty of taste, may pick out the books they like best. They may skim a novel hurriedly; they may read one or two chapters and throw the work aside; they may read the last chapter first and the first chapter last. So also the visitor in a picture gallery may devote an hour to one canvas, a minute to another, a second to a third, as his fancy dictates. That there are pictures he dislikes need not bother him. He may spend his entire time looking at those he does like. He may shut out the view of the works that offend his feelings by turning his back upon them. But the unfortunate subscriber to concerts sometimes is compelled to listen to music that he hates. To be sure, he may leave the room, though departures of this sort generally are censured severely by press and public. But in doing this he forfeits something for which he has paid and gets nothing in return. He is not in the position of the reader, who may change one book for another, or the picture-gazer, who may suit his taste or mood. Had Parker compared the symphony concerts to a series of lectures or readings he would have created a closer analogy. Surely subscribers to a course of readings would be as divided in their opinions as the Boston Symphony audiences and quite as wrought up if they found that the works chosen for reading were not to their liking.

Yet Parker is perfectly right in the principle for which he contends, and the lesson is one that New Yorkers even more than Bostonians should take to heart. The root of the trouble lies in the fact that Americans are not yet as cultivated in music as they are in the other arts. The man of literary instincts takes an interest in all important contributions to literature, whether they please his palate or not. The connoisseur in delineative art has an open eye for all that is new, even if it conflicts with his personal ideas. But the great majority of concertgoers in this country have not reached the point where intellectual satisfaction is gained from works that find no responsive emotional chord. To quote Parker's description of Muck's opponents, "They like to hear—what they like to hear, and they are resentful of all else." Surely that's not only "a narrow and selfish view," but one that is not worthy of any man or woman professing musical, not to say general culture.

MAX SMITH.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
APR 26 1908

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston on May 1 and 2, respectively. He will take leave with the programme he used at his first appearance there in October, 1906. It is Beethoven's C minor symphony and "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner.

HERALD APRIL 28, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR CHELSEA RELIEF HAS LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Harold Bauer, pianist, gave a concert last evening in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the Chelsea relief fund. Dr. Muck conducted. This was the programme: Beethoven, overture, "Leonore" No. 3, piano concerto in E-flat major, No. 5; Chabrier, "Espana"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

Mr. Bauer and the orchestra gave their services and the entire rectipts of the concert will be given to the fund. There was a very large audience, and many stood, for besides the opportunity to help out a cause in which the public is warmly interested, there was the opportunity to hear the orchestra, a privilege which many who do not hold season tickets are obliged almost wholly to forego. The few extra concerts that have been given since the establishment of the orchestra's pension fund have met with an immediate response from the public, gratifying both to the orchestra and to the city as a music-loving community. This was also the last opportunity for many of seeing Dr. Muck conduct.

The progmamme was suitably popular, and the performance was one of charcteristic brilliance. Nothing could have given greater pleasure than this concerto played as it was by Mr. Bauer, with great power, with sympathy and with color. Nor could anything else quite have filled the place of Chabrier's Rhapsody, the performance of which by the Boston orchestra is familiar.

The audience was a festal one, and was keenly appreciative, not only of the high order of the performance, but of the readiness and generosity with which all the players had given their time and services to the cause. The applause was prolonged after each of the numbers, so that Mr. Bauer and Dr. Muck were repeatedly recalled. The latter called upon the orchestra to rise and acknowledge its share of the tribute.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn. "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."
Schubert. Symphony without Kettledrums and Trumpets.
D'Indy. "Summer Day on the Mountain."

Mendelssohn, the melodic, suave, genteel Mendelssohn, held his own very well against the rest of the programme on Saturday. Part of the success of the overture was due to the noble reading of Dr. Muck, who made the picture of "Meeresstille" as graphic as Coleridge's description of being "as idle as a painted ship, upon a painted ocean." We were glad too that the misleading title of "Calm Sea" was changed into "Sea-calm,"—a very different thing. Goethe's picture (not as powerful as that of Coleridge) runs:—

"Deepest silence on the waters,
Without motion rests the sea,
And the sailor sees around him
Only flat monotony.

Not a breath of air is stirring,
Utter stillness, as the grave,
In the whole wide, vast horizon
Moveth not a single wave."

And this picture was given by the orchestra with a power that was phenomenal. No one could have mistaken that introduction (as has often been done) for a calm, smiling and pleasant sea.

The portrayal grows feebler when the boatswain blows his whistle, the sails are hoisted, and the ship ploughs its way onward. Here one wished for a Richard Strauss; yet the final blare of trumpets at "Land ho!" was exciting enough and was finely played.

The almost unknown Schubert symphony was scarcely worth resuscitating. It was a work intended for his little coterie of musical comrades to play at, and Schubert probably never dreamed of its elevation to the post of honor in a great orchestral concert. To have heard it in a parlor, given by talented amateurs, would have been a keen delight; but it scarcely sustained its place between its big neighbors on this occasion.

The first movement was clear as crystal, melodic and terse, but Dr. Muck magnified it into more dramatic power than we imagine Schubert intended. The second movement was one of those slow movements of "divine length," full of tenderness but also of repetitions. Had it come after the D'Indy composition it would have been a good poultice "to heal the wounds of sound." Alas, we have outgrown this kind of simplicity and the twentieth century is impatient of repetitions. If there is to be great length, as there was in this case, it must be filled with knotty problems and troublesome dissonances; it must give the mystical utterances of an oracle, not the innocent prattle of a child.

The Minuet and Trio was interesting. It was more virile than many of the minuets of Mozart or Haydn and it had more of the waltz than of the minuet spirit. It is interesting to note the transition from the Minuet into the Waltz in some of Schubert's Minuets. The rhythm was here marked 3-4, but the effect was very frequently 6-4, which is the true waltz rhythm, although the 3-4 rhythm is still invariably marked upon the Waltz also.

The Finale had little to say for itself but was one of the light-hearted endings with which Mozart and Haydn ended their cycle forms—a rather bad legacy from the Gigue of the Suite. Not even the good playing of the orchestra and the sharp contrasts and hearty virility which Dr. Muck read into the work could make it a true symphonic number, it remains a pretty symphony for amateurs, a striking contrast to the glory of the C major symphony by the same composer.

It is related that the philosoper Kant was once approached by some students and questioned as to the meaning of one of his involved sentences. He read and re-read the sentence and finally said: "I cannot now recall just what I meant here, but it is a very important sentence and you would do well to devote yourselves to its thorough study!" We should like to question D'Indy as to the meaning of very many sentences in his Symphonic Trouble entitled "Summer day on the Mountain."

We do not need to tell those familiar with modern musical radicals that the score was very long, that it had many hitheto unheard-of progressions, that it called for all possible instruments. All possible instruments, except factory-whistles, have been used by the modern composer. But there is one instrument employed here that makes its marked effect in the score—the piano-forte. This instrument has been used as an orchestral tone-color as long ago as Berlioz, who used it, four-handed, in his Tempest Fantasie to picture the surging of billows. D'Indy brings out some strong effects with this piano tone-color and, in fact, all the tone-coloring of this work is powerful and masterly.

But this field of orchestral technique is just now in its finest flower. Where, 70 years ago, the world possessed one Berlioz, (who was considered absurdly extravagant in his orchestral demands), it now has a dozen. Berlioz, Wagner and Liszt are left behind by the bold experimenters of the present.

But the content of the work was also striking at times. The first movement seemed the most comprehensible and poetic. It carried out the same idea that Mascagni exploited in his Sunrise, in "Iris," and in the same general manner. It began with a terrifically extended crescendo ("Pochissimo a pochissimo") starting from almost inaudibility. Few orchestras could have played this crescendo as it was performed at this concert. Few conductors could have read the movement as impressively as Dr. Muck did on this occasion.

The second movement, "Afternoon under the Pines," was something that must have puzzled every thinking auditor. It was a portrayal of moods and of changes of moods. What with Debussy's afternoon of the Faun and D'Indy's afternoon of the mountaineer, we should advise French composers to distrust their muse after 12 o'clock. There were good melodic thoughts presented in a fragmentary manner, there was an abundance of ingenious figure treatment. Thus much was clear if the auditor would busy himself in piecing it together—and it was worth while for it was a good example of modern intellectuality.

But there were other points as mystical as Delphic utterances. Why did the rustic melody develop into fury? Why were there mutterings of a tempest on a peaceful afternoon? Why the roll of a side drum and [illegible] mood? Was Napoleon crossing the Alps?

Then came "Night" with an impressive suggestion of distant bells. In the midst of all this tranquillity came a sudden crash. This might mean anything. The bed breaking down? Burglars? An alarm clock going off at the wrong hour? We do not know.

There was some splendid harp work and an actual melody for the horn! But the oboe bit off the last end of this. In spite of all the intentional mystifications of this work we found some strength in it. It may be that we shall yet become inured to successions of dissonances. They may have their meaning, as the Bohemian sentence (all consonants, as the modern works are sometimes all dissonance),—"Strz prst skrz krk"—has its meaning to those who speak the language. At present we do not speak this language and we only dimly comprehend it. We wish that there were more of absolute beauty to it. We think part of its fogginess needless and possibly affected. Yet we would gladly sit through this work again to study the good points which it undoubtedly has and to see if we could unravel some more of it. Music has become mighty hard work for conductors, musicians, critics and auditors in these days.

Louis C. Elson.

APRIL 27, 1908
TRANSCRIPT,
MUSIC AND DRAMA

D'INDY'S NEW PIECE AT A SECOND HEARING

The Illuminating and Sympathetic Performance That Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Gave It—The Qualities That Set Mr. d'Indy Apart from the Composers of the Hour and Their Play in the "Symphonic Pictures"—The New Freedom and the New Humanity of the Music—The Week-End Concerts—The Same Old Bernhardt in the Same Old Sort of Play—News of New Plays and Departing Singers

Mr. d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, renewed and heightened every impression that it had made on Friday. It came, as well, to still more illuminating, sympathetic and communicating performance. The music asks tonal magnificence when it pictures the dawn and speaks with the emotions of the daybreak, catching each momentary impression of the scene, quivering to the feeling the moments stir in the solitary and poetically minded beholder, and then absorbing each detail of both into its own advancing flood of light and of passion. For Mr. d'Indy has written here with true passion for the awakening light and for the awakening world—for the daily miracle of the re-creation out of dark and stillness of the world of sun and man, as it may stir a lofty and abstracted spirit no less truly than twenty commoner emotions. Again, in the second "picture" of the revery under the pines of the mountain side, with the sounds of the valley and its life below jarring into it and stirring it anew, the music asks a quiet loveliness and intensity of sustained tone that shall weave its own mood, into which the sounds of the external life shall break with the poetic and, in its finer sense, the dramatic significance that the composer designed. As it seemed to us there was no grotesqueness and little obscurity in the poetic content of the music as Dr. Muck and his men played it. They wrought d'Indy's picture. Again beauty of tone——the shadowed, mantling, soothing beauty that Mr. d'Indy seeks in much of his "picture" of the falling night—wrought the mood of his imagining. In a word Dr. Muck discovered and communicated the intrinsic beauty and poetry of the music. It is easy to play Mr. d'Indy's pieces so that they shall seem long and weary exercises in abstruse ideas, strange progressions, recondite orchestral timbres and laborious subtleties of musical thought and expression. Played to the letter, but not with the spirit, they seem to justify many of the reserves and reproaches of those who hear his music without pleasure, understanding or emotion. Then suddenly comes the illuminating performance, that enters into the exalted mind and the truly spiritualizing temperament of the composer; that feels the poetry that stirred in him, the beauty of idea and the loftiness of answering emotion that he would express, and straightway the music is eloquent with that beauty, poetry and feeling, and the means become only means, that justify themselves by what they achieve, that seem sometimes inevitable to the end. Such a performance Dr. Muck gave to the new "symphonic pictures." The listeners heard and felt the spirit, as well as the matter and the manner of Mr. d'Indy.

In this spirit, as it seems more and more to us, lies the peculiar appeal of Mr. d'Indy's music and the peculiar place he has now gained among the composers of our time. Debussy and his brethren would make the vague and the evanescent and the emotions that they stir, tangible. They are concerned with the fitful visions of the dreaming faun with the sea that is never still, with the flitting phantoms of the shadowy Allemonde where Pélléas and Mélisande dwelt and and died. Strauss and his followers would make philosophies and sensualities alternately audible in music with Zarathrusta or Salome. Or they would search broken minds like Don Quixote's or lusting souls like Electra's. Theirs is music of abnormal mental process applying itself to abnormal things. Puccini and his imitators of the opera house—and Mr. d'Indy writes operas as well as symphonic pieces, though we in America never hear them—are all for effective passion. They write passionately and they never forget their audience. Mr. d'Indy stands apart from all these and the other groups and tendencies of our musical time. The vague does not fascinate him; the [illegible] leaves him cold; the effective stirs him to contempt. His [illegible] is abstract spirit. It turns instinctively to high, large, and fine emotions. It seeks the detached and distilled essence of them. It would search out the beauty and the power and the purity of this essence and then express it in tones. Mr. d'Indy reflects upon spiritual things; they stir him to emotion as well; and most of all they quicken him to a kind of aspiration. Out of this thought that is so deep, out of this aspiration that is so pure, he would draw a music of new beauties and of new emotions that shall be above all a spiritual voice. He would restore music to the loftier and austerer beauty, to the purity and the nobility of spirit that is in his master Franck, and that Franck in turn felt in many a page of Beethoven. Subtle and unusual, strange and irritating may be the means by which d'Indy would accomplish this purpose; he has made them a harmonic and an instrumental idiom evolved out of endless reflection and endless aspiration. Yet they gain his end for those who will understand and feel his goal and thereby are they justified.

"In a Summer Day on the Mountain," as it seemed again on Saturday night, Mr. d'Indy has come closer than he has hitherto to this exalted and spiritualized ideal. In the second symphony the struggle was uppermost; the austerity of the process left the hearer cold; he appreciated the nobility of the ideal; he thrilled to the pursuit of it; but Mr. d'Indy did not quite lead him into the beauty that he sought and into the intensities of the emotion that the ideal awakened. There was too little human quality in the music. It did not quite summon the warmth of the ideal beauty that it sought; it did not quite communicate the emotion of it. The new piece escapes this seeming effort and austerity. It goes farther even than the symphony in recondite process—in the development and the relation of the melodies, in harmonies, in rhythm, in instrumental coloring, but they gain their end so completely that the hearer barely heeds them. They bring the beauty and they impart the emotion that they seek. Clearer, too, is the peculiar beauty, intensity and spiritual quality of Mr. d'Indy's melody. There is nothing common or sensuous in it; nothing that is either deliberately graphic or deliberately vague. It is the voice of the pure beauty that he seeks; it has in it, notably in the second and the third of the "pictures," the aspiring emotion that has stirred in him. It is intrinsically spiritual. His feeling has distilled it out of his thought.

The peculiar quality of this thought and feeling is its power to idealize. Orchestral dawns are nowadays almost a convention of delineative music. The youth of the conservatories make them from approved patterns. The wonder, the beauty and the power of Mr. d'Indy' dawn is not that his music makes it graphic, stirring from dimness and silence into the light and life of the awakening world. Mr. d'Indy does not write merely delineative music of a miracle of nature. He has written the music of the emotion and the poetry of the dawn in a high and solitary place and in as high and solitary exaltation of mood. It is the emotion that kindles in all of us, unless we are clods and dullards, in such a moment, place and mood that he has brought to expression. He has liberated its essence into his tones. He has spiritualized and idealized it in his thought. Not merely awakening earth and awakening life from valley to mountain top speak in the climax in which the "picture" ends. There is long-pent emotion, universal and human, in it as well.

And so again with the second "picture." Orchestral reveries are as old orchestral dawns; but not such idealizing reveries as this with its dream-atmosphere of soft clear light and air, and stirring and throbbing through it such a song of aspiration, of spiritualized and idealized longing. Again Mr. d'Indy has sublimated to poetry and to beauty and so released in tones true and deep and universal emotions. He has bound them to earth; for the valley and its life interrupt them; but out of this interruption springs the aspiration anew, the deeper and the warmer. Thus these jangling sounds have their poetic purpose. They keep the essential human quality of the whole tone-poem. It returns again in the joyous tumult of freedom from the day with which the picture of "night" begins. It softens as rest and shadow steal over the mountain and the valleys. And then it merges and vanishes in the music of calm, of stillness, of a soothing and all-enfolding darkness with which Mr. d'Indy ends. Again it is more than music of delineation. It is the music of the emotion of night, of its healing and its peace in a vast and solitary place, of the aspiration that has stilled itself in the universal [illegible]. In many a sense throughout the piece, the mountain has released Mr. d'Indy and humanized him.

H. T. P.

Here in Boston

The "Pop" concerts, which begin a week from tomorrow at Symphony Hall, are to continue only seven weeks this year—through June 20, the Saturday after class day at Harvard. Experience has shown that their public dwindles quickly after the end of the academic year.

POST
[illegible]
APR 26 1908

PROF. WILLY HESS, for three years the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theater in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season.

[193]

BEETHOVEN—FOR CHELSEA

An Extra Concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the Chelsea Relief Fund, with Beethoven, Wagner and Chabrier to Make the Programme—The "Emperor" Concerto Again and Sundry Morals

The movement for the relief of Chelsea received an important contribution financially and musically from the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening with Mr. Harold Bauer as soloist. With an evening threatening rain, the hall was filled to its utmost capacity by an audience whose insistence in the matter of recalls deserved a better reward. The programme, a comfortable mixture of the tried and tested and the new, was:

Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Beethoven: "Emperor" Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.
Chabrier: "España."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

With the exception of Chabrier's "Rhapsody," which kept producing the starts and blinks of a bunch of rockets set off under an unsuspecting nose, the evening was a time for settling back to the enjoyment of three of the traditional favorites of concert programmes—a skimming of the season's cream in what may be termed the classico-popular. The "Leonore" Overture, given with sombre emphasis and great richness of coloring, made an imposing portal through which to enter the more stately edifice of the E-flat concerto which immediately followed. The accents of the hidden trumpt, resolute and yet mysterious, distant but distinct, and the concluding rushes of sounding crescendo courted the mood of the concerto.

Mr. Bauer's performance of this work was not its first in Boston this season. Early in the winter, on an occasion of a somewhat similar character, Mr. Paderewski played the concerto which bears the title of "Emperor," and played it imperially, albeit somewhat as a monarch grown impatient of his realm, as might be inferred from the immense demands he made on the instrument. Beethoven had written a symphony with the pianoforte as an integral part. Mr. Paderewski sought to be symphonic. He was all that and more. He was epic. But incidentally one's sympathies were often with the instrument which was humming, singing, or exulting at a pitch which made its doings orchestral. Obviously no one but a Paderewski could begin in such a vein and carry it off. He did, and naturally his performance was the Iliad of performances of that work. Mr. Bauer, on the other hand, was last night, frankly the pianist, compliantly a part of the symphonic structure where the score called for his subordination, and joyfully the protagonist where it thrust him forward again. The noble first theme was given in heroics, a mood which was sustained throughout the movement without a drop into the theatrical, though nothing, with that constantly recurring phrase, would have been more easy.

It is, as the composer doubtless intended it should be, a never-ending source of regret that the slow movement, the matchless adagio, is so short. Its psalmody is announced by orchestra, finely contrasted by the solo instrument, given a brief development, and concluded by an epilogue in a mood as near to beatific vision as the black and white keyboard has approached. If there was more of the romantic in Mr. Bauer's reading of the first movement, in the second he was the lyrist, fitting his theme to the flutter of nightingale's wings. It is a singular piece of perversity that just at the point in the concerto where the composer designed that the solo instrument should be most completely and most beautifully merged into the symphonic scheme, taking its place as an orchestral instrument, no matter how faithfully the soloist labors to efface himself, it is precisely at this point in the concerto that the instrument most completely and most beautifully asserts its peculiar loveliness, as if the cold of morals had invaded music and read a new symbolism of sounds into the precept that he who loseth his life shall find it. Certainly, in the last half of the adagio, the piano loses itself in the orchestra most gracefully, only to find itself in new beauty.

Periodically, also, we are amused by the announcement of a new project in concerted music for piano and orchestra in which the composer proposes to make the piano an integral part of the band, giving it only such prominence as would naturally fall to harp or drums, or again we learn of a piano concerto on a truly symphonic scale (though no one so far, as in the case of Edouard Lalo's thinly-disguised violin concerto, has ventured to call such an essay a "symphony"). Schumann, whose concerto for pianoforte in A minor is ranked next to the concertos of Beethoven, may have had something of this sort in mind when he wrote the charming duet for piano and violoncello in his slow movement. But indeed they all come back to these four pages of the "Emperor" concerto, of which Hector Berlioz, in his treatise on instrumentation says: "On one occasion only has it been deemed well to employ the pianoforte in the orchestra under the same class as other instruments; that is to say, letting it bring to the aggregate its own peculiar resources—which nothing can replace. Certain passages in Beethoven's concertos ought, nevertheless, to have drawn the attention of composers to this point. Doubtless they have all admired the marvellous effect produced in his grand concerto in E-flat by the slow beatings ('batteries') of the two hands on the piano in the high octaves during the air for flute, clarinet and bassoon, and upon the contratempos of the stringed instruments. Thus surrounded, the sonorousness of the piano is of the most seductive kind; it is full of calm and freshness, and is a type of grace itself."

During the Rondo a sprite was in the piano. Incidentally imps were in the violins, for the moist night had strings snapping, and at least one of the players at the first desk of the violins was reduced to virtuoso shifts on three strings for the rest of the concerto, much to the glee of the adjacent 'cellos. Here, nevertheless, the soloist was at his best—off joyously at the head of an elfin rout, gay, sweet, fantastic, full of pranks. Indeed, throughout the concerto there is something Shakspearean in the gorgeous play of fancy co-existent, with ... coherence to form ... concerto ... [illegible] ... the title of "Emperor" is a perpetual challenge to emulation, but the composition which now lacks but one year of its centenary, with its dominion still supreme and only challenged perhaps twice in that period, has fairly earned the title. And at least Mr. Bauer may be reckoned the ... prince.

ADVERTISER APRIL 28, 1908

CHELSEA RELIEF FUND CONCERT.

Last evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck and the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, generously volunteered their services for a concert, the entire receipts of which were given to the Chelsea Relief fund. The following was the programme:—

Beethoven—Leonore Overture No. 3.
Beethoven—Concerto in E flat (Emperor).
Chabrier—Espana.
Wagner—Tannhäuser Overture.

A more enjoyable programme we have seldom heard. Beethoven's truly marvelous Leonore No. 3 never sounded better, indeed we could scarcely ask for a better reading of it.

The "Emperor" Concerto, too, made a fine effect. Mr. Bauer was at his very best and played the work con amore.

In truth it was a memorable performance and the audience recognized this fact by its many recalls of Mr. Bauer.

Chabrier's "Espana" and the "Tannhauser" overture brought the concert to a close. A large audience was present and applauded enthusiastically.

F. S. M.

APRIL 28, 1908. GLOBE-

IN AID OF CHELSEA.

Concert by Symphony Orchestra and Harold Bauer Adds Liberal Sum to Relief Fund.

The Boston symphony orchestra under Dr Karl Muck and with the assistance of the pianist, Harold Bauer, gave its concert last night in aid of the Chelsea fire sufferers and realised roughly $2700, the whole of which goes to the fund, as there were no expenses connected with the concert. This is about $200 more than was realized at the concert given in aid of the San Francisco sufferers, which, curiously enough, was given exactly two years ago this last Sunday night.

Symphony hall was filled to its capacity and a number of persons had to take standing room. The program consisted of three orchestral numbers, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody" and the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr Bauer played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

At the end of the first number, the "Leonore" overture, the applause was so insistent that Dr Muck called on the whole orchestra to respond. Mr Bauer received many recalls and the "Tannhauser" overture, which ended the program, excited the customary enthusiasm.

APRIL 28, 1908 POST.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN AID OF CHELSEA RELIEF FUND

BY OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Muck made his final appearance before the general public of this city at the concert given by the Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Chelsea sufferers yesterday evening in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Third Leonore overture and piano concerto in E flat, Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody, "Espana," and the Tannhauser overture.

The hall was well filled, and the concert was, without doubt, the success artistically that it was financially. The reading of the overture was one of surpassing brilliancy and dramatic force, though there was, perhaps, a tendency to sentimentalize in the measures immediately following the trumpet calls. Mr. Bauer has never played with more virility and noble breadth than he did on this occasion. His performance will not be easily forgotten. He was recalled with an insistency which is rare even at these concerts, but wisely refrained from encores. The "Espana" again exerted its quick and irresistible fascination. At the close of the Tannhauser overture there was stormy applause and shouts of "bravo" for Dr. Muck, who had previously bade his men rise and acknowledge the tribute of the audience.

DR. KARL MUCK.

Dr. Muck this week ends his engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His going is deeply regretted, for he has endeared himself as man and musician to the people of this city. He has also enlarged the glory of the orchestra in the cities visited each year, and he has been largely instrumental in spreading its fame both in this country and in Europe.

As a conductor he has displayed the highest qualities. As a disciplinarian he has maintained the high standard of mechanical proficiency that has long distinguished the orchestra, but he is neither a martinet nor a pedagogue. He has shown a most catholic taste in his choice of compositions for performance, and he has thus broadened our musical horizon. Whatever his personal taste may be, he has recognized the fact that the audience should be acquainted with the results of contemporaneous musical activity in whatever country, in whatever form, in whatever direction this activity may be exercised. At the same time he has treated with affectionate respect the classic composers who years ago, by their conservative contemporaries, were looked upon as dangerous radicals, if not pestilent revolutionaries. He has been a true interpreter; he has the rare gift of interpreting so that the hearer is face to face with the composer and able fully to understand the musical speech. The music is here not filtered through the individuality of the conductor. And as an interpreter Dr. Muck has been passionate and eloquent without extravagance, without any disturbing self-display.

Dr. Muck is more than an accomplished musician, more than a conductor of the first rank. He is a man of sound parts and brilliant acquirements; a man deeply interested in all that pertains to sociology; a man of singularly agreeable address and distinguished bearing. Furthermore, he has the great and saving sense of humor.

It would be a pleasure to think that Dr. Muck might sometime return to this city, where he is held high in honor, yet those nearest to him would not expect him to break faith with Emperor William, who has generously denied himself for the last two years. It is not surprising that the Emperor now wishes Dr. Muck to return to the duties of the office that he brilliantly adorns.

From NEWS
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date APR 26 1908

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston, May 1 and 2, respectively. He will take leave with the same program he used at his first appearance, in October, 1906, Beethoven's C minor symphony, and "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. It is an interesting coincidence that on April 29 this year the orchestra is giving a concert in aid of the fund which is being raised for the benefit of the sufferers of the Chelsea, Mass., fire. Dr. Muck will conduct. On April 26, 1906, a similar concert was given in aid of the San Francisco sufferer. Had Symphony Hall not been in use for another concert on Sunday evening, the 28th, this concert would have been given on the corresponding Sunday of the other one.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.
From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date APR 26

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL.

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston on May 1 and 2, respectively. He will take leave with the same programme he used at his first appearance in October, 1906, Beethoven's C-minor symphony and "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. It is an interesting coincidence that on April 29 this year the orchestra is giving a concert in aid of the fund which is being raised for the benefit of the sufferers of the Chelsea, Mass., fire. Dr. Muck will conduct. On April 26, 1906, a similar concert was given in aid of the San Francisco sufferers. Had Symphony Hall not been in use for another concert on Sunday evening, [illegible] this concert [illegible] corresponding

[194]

[illegible] Strange Things [illegible] Symphony Concerts, [illegible] Conclusions He Drew [illegible] Muck, the Orchestra, [illegible] and the Audience—A Striking [illegible] by Brieux in Paris, with a [illegible] That the Reviewers Count a [illegible] piece, and a Conclusion That [illegible] written in a Night

Mr. Tardieu, the Parisian [illegible] lectured at Harvard last [illegible] is now writing his impressions [illegible] life in his newspaper, Le [illegible] saw and heard strange [illegible] phony Concerts. He writes [illegible] or two about them in one [illegible] letters, and the reader here [illegible] easily wonder whether he really at[illegible] a Symphony Concert, and, if not, [illegible] and how he received so much [illegible] tion concerning them. American [illegible] make strange discoveries in France, [illegible] French writers apparently are as fortu[illegible] nate—or as unfortunate—in America [illegible] Tardieu, for example, has seen several hun[illegible] dred listeners standing at each Symphony [illegible] Concert—a sight vouchsafed only [illegible] eyes in recent years on the Saturday [illegible] (that he carefully specifies) in Symphony [illegible] Hall. He further reports that seats at [illegible] the Symphony Concerts—"or at least some [illegible] of them"—are not particularly [illegible] statement that is true of the second balcony [illegible] on Friday afternoons, but that hardly holds [illegible] of all the other places, alike at the afternoon and the evening concerts, when the premiums of the auctions are added to the fixed prices.

Then, after a sentence about Dr. Muck as a "well-known German kapellmeister"—tritest of adjectives and title for a conductor who has been distinguished in Europe for a dozen years—the observant and discriminating Tardieu passes to the programmes. Presumably he examined them with care, since he flatly affirms that they are "severe and heavy." Mr. Tardieu is clearly entitled to his opinion, but he quickly leaves that safe ground for what he seems to believe are facts. The programmes, it seems, move in cycles; there are "Beethoven evenings," for example, and "Wagner evenings" with "more Wagner than Beethoven." Like the "standees" on Saturday nights, these "Beethoven evenings" are known exclusively to Mr. Tardieu, for the programme books of the Symphony Orchestra have shamelessly omitted all trace of them. The only discoverable "Wagner evening" is the Pension Fund concert last February, when Dr. Muck [illegible] "Wagner programme," as Mr. Chevillard [illegible] Mr. Chévillard do—and three or [illegible] in a season—in Paris. And there [illegible] Wagner than Beethoven"! Exactly [illegible] pieces by Wagner—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Kaisermarch" have stood on the programmes of the regular Symphony Concerts in the two years in which Dr. Muck has been the conductor of the orchestra, and a chief grievance of those who resent his programmes has been his "neglect of Wagner." As for Beethoven, Dr. Muck has played eight of his nine symphonies, at least four of his overtures and two of his concertos.

Even now the discovering Tardieu is not content. "German music," it seems, "enjoys a monopoly with Dr. Muck." It does, indeed, as in the striking instances of Debussy, d'Indy, Franck, Lalo, Bizet, Tschaikovski, Glazounoff, Smetana, Sibelius Sinding Grieg, MacDowell, Loeffler and Chadwick. Then, to cap the climax, "Dr. Muck hardly practises the policy of the open door in his programmes. Yet he has opened it so wide that a considerable part of his public has been complaining bitterly for months past of the excess of new pieces in the Symphony Concerts, and the mere figures of the record exceed those of any other conductor, in the whole existence of the Symphony Orchestra, for a similar length of time. Mr. Colonne, Mr. Chévillard and Mr. Marly are able and energetic conductors in Paris; they sprinkle their programmes with new pieces in the course of a year; but they keep no such "open door" to the music of the schools as has Dr. Muck. We have run over their programmes of the current season as carefully we hope as Mr. Tardieu examined those of the Symphony Orchestra. The number of those new pieces, with each of the three Parisian orchestras, is less than that which our orchestra either under Dr. Muck or in the later years of Mr. Gericke has regularly played. Moreover, French composers have by far the largest share of these new pieces on the Parisian programmes. Here in Boston, for four years past, the door has been open—to [illegible] Tardieu's figure—to the new music of the world.

Dr. Muck is rather the fashion, though Mr. Tardieu, and the "ovations that he receives"—ovations sems a very large word—are partly the conventional thing. Yet he is good enough to admit that one of the ablest and best-esteemed conductors of our time has "fine and nervous" qualities that justify his success, and that one of the finest orchestras in the world is accurate, but a little cold. The poor innocents in Boston have [illegible] otherwise, especially in the two years of Dr. Muck's leadership; some of [illegible] even heard Parisians, who go [illegible] concerts, perhaps, than does [illegible] Mr. Tardieu, praise its animation [illegible] the indifference and routine of [illegible] orchestras; but we are notoriously [illegible] complaisant folk, and as Mr. [illegible] remarks—not less complaisant—[illegible] cal taste is not yet as cultivated [illegible] United States as it is in other [illegible] However, he is good enough [illegible] that three thousand "snobs" [illegible] every week to Symphony Hall [illegible] plaud music that wearies them [illegible] fashion would not suffice to [illegible] such numerous and attentive [illegible] that the musical taste of Boston [illegible] ready" secure; and that, [illegible] where in America, it will grow [illegible] itself. We have "enlightened [illegible] to help the process, but [illegible] is going to [illegible]—such [illegible]

BEETHOVEN—FOR CHELSEA

An Extra Concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the Chelsea Relief Fund, with Beethoven, Wagner and Chabrier to Make the Programme—The "Emperor" Concerto Again and Sundry Morals

The movement for the relief of Chelsea received an important contribution financially and musically from the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening with Mr. Harold Bauer as soloist. With an evening threatening rain, the hall was filled to its utmost capacity by an audience whose insistence in the matter of recalls deserved a better reward. The programme, a comfortable mixture of the tried and tested and the new, was:

Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Beethoven: "Emperor" Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.
Chabrier: "España."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

With the exception of Chabrier's "Rhapsody," which kept producing the starts and blinks of a bunch of rockets set off under an unsuspecting nose, the evening was a time for settling back to the enjoyment of three of the traditional favorites of concert programmes—a skimming of the season's cream in what may be termed the classico-popular. The "Leonore" Overture, given with sombre emphasis and great richness of coloring, made an imposing portal through which to enter the more stately edifice of the E-flat concerto which immediately followed. The accents of the hidden trumpt, resolute and yet mysterious, distant but distinct, and the concluding rushes of sounding crescendo courted the mood of the concerto.

Mr. Bauer's performance of this work was not its first in Boston this season. Early in the winter, on an occasion of a somewhat similar character, Mr. Paderewski played the concerto which bears the title of "Emperor," and played it imperially, albeit somewhat as a monarch grown impatient of his realm, as might be inferred from the immense demands he made on the instrument. Beethoven had written a symphony with the pianoforte as an integral part. Mr. Paderewski sought to be symphonic. He was all that and more. He was epic. But incidentally one's sympathies were often with the instrument which was humming, singing, or exulting at a pitch which made its doings orchestral. Obviously no one but a Paderewski could begin in such a vein and carry it off. He did, and naturally his performance was the Iliad of performances of that work. Mr. Bauer, on the other hand, was last night, frankly the pianist, compliantly a part of the symphonic structure where the score called for his subordination, and joyfully the protagonist where it thrust him forward again. The noble first theme was given in heroics, a mood which was sustained throughout the movement without a drop into the theatrical, though nothing, with that constantly recurring phrase, would have been more easy.

It is, as the composer doubtless intended it should be, a never-ending source of regret that the slow movement, the matchless adagio, is so short. Its psalmody is announced by orchestra, finely contrasted by the solo instrument, given a brief development, and concluded by an epilogue in a mood as near to beatific vision as the black and white keyboard has approached. If there was more of the romantic in Mr. Bauer's reading of the first movement, in the second he was the lyrist, fitting his theme to the flutter of nightingale's wings. It is a singular piece of perversity that just at the point in the concerto where the composer designed that the solo instrument should be most completely and most beautifully merged into the symphonic scheme, taking its place as an orchestral instrument, no matter how faithfully the soloist labors to efface himself, it is precisely at this point in the concerto that the instrument most completely and most beautifully asserts its peculiar loveliness, as if the field of morals had invaded music and read a new symbolism of sounds into the precept that he who loseth his life shall find it. Certainly, in the last half of the adagio, the piano loses itself in the orchestra most gracefully, only to find itself in new beauty.

Periodically, also, we are amused by the announcement of a new project in concerted music for piano and orchestra in which the composer proposes to make the piano an integral part of the band, giving it only such prominence as would naturally fall to harp or drums, or again we learn of a piano concerto on a truly symphonic scale (though no one so far, as in the case of Edouard Lalo's thinly-disguised violin concerto, has ventured to call such an essay a "symphony"). Schumann, whose concerto for pianoforte in A minor is ranked next to the concertos of Beethoven, may have had something of this sort in mind when he wrote the charming duet for piano and violoncello in his slow movement. But indeed they all come back to these four pages of the "Emperor" concerto, of which Hector Berlioz, in his treatise on instrumentation says: "On one occasion only has it been deemed well to employ the pianoforte in the orchestra under the same class as other instruments; that is to say, letting it bring to the aggregate its own peculiar resources—which nothing can replace. Certain passages in Beethoven's concertos ought, nevertheless, to have drawn the attention of composers to this point. Doubtless they have all admired the marvellous effect produced in his grand concerto in E-flat by the slow beatings ('batteries') of the two hands on the piano in the high octaves during the air for flute, clarinet and bassoon, and upon the contratempos of the stringed instruments. Thus surrounded, the sonorousness of the piano is of the most seductive kind; it is full of calm and freshness, and is a type of grace itself."

During the Rondo a sprite was in the piano. Incidentally imps were in the violins, for the moist night had strings snapping, and at least one of the players at the first desk of the violins was reduced to virtuoso shifts on three strings for the rest of the concerto, much to the glee of the adjacent 'cellos. Here, nevertheless, the soloist was at his best—off joyously at the head of an elfin rout, gay, sweet, fantastic, full of pranks. Indeed, throughout the concerto there is something Shakspearean in the gorgeous play of fancy co-existent, with a rigorous adherence to form. A concerto which bears the title of "Emperor" is a perpetual challenge to emulation, but the composition which now lacks but one year of its centenary, with its dominion still supreme and only challenged perhaps twice in that period, has fairly earned the title. And at least Mr. Bauer may be reckoned the crown prince.

ADVERTISER. APRIL 28, 1908

CHELSEA RELIEF FUND CONCERT.

Last evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck and the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, generously volunteered their services for a concert, the entire receipts of which were given to the Chelsea Relief fund. The following was the programme:—

Beethoven—Leonore Overture No. 3.
Beethoven—Concerto in E flat (Emperor).
Chabrier—Espana.
Wagner—Tannhauser Overture.

A more enjoyable programme we have seldom heard. Beethoven's truly marvellous Leonore No. 3. never sounded better, indeed we could scarcely ask for a better reading of it.

The "Emperor" Concerto, too, made a fine effect. Mr. Bauer was at his very best and played the work con amore.

In truth it was a memorable performance and the audience recognized this fact by its many recalls of Mr. Bauer.

Chabrier's "Espana" and the "Tannhauser" overture brought the concert to a close. A large audience was present and applauded enthusiastically.

F. S. M.

APRIL 28, 1908. GLOBE-

IN AID OF CHELSEA.

Concert by Symphony Orchestra and Harold Bauer Adds Liberal Sum to Relief Fund.

The Boston symphony orchestra under Dr Karl Muck and with the assistance of the pianist, Harold Bauer, gave its concert last night in aid of the Chelsea fire sufferers and realized roughly $2700, the whole of which goes to the fund, as there were no expenses connected with the concert. This is about $200 more than was realized at the concert given in aid of the San Francisco sufferers, which, curiously enough, was given exactly two years ago this last Sunday night.

Symphony hall was filled to its capacity and a number of persons had to take standing room. The program consisted of three orchestral numbers, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody" and the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr Bauer played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

At the end of the first number, the "Leonore" overture, the applause was so insistent that Dr Muck called on the whole orchestra to respond. Mr Bauer received many recalls and the "Tannhauser" overture, which ended the program, excited the customary enthusiasm.

APRIL 28, 1908 POST.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN AID OF CHELSEA RELIEF FUND

BY OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Muck made his final appearance before the general public of this city at the concert given by the Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Chelsea sufferers yesterday evening in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Third Leonore overture and piano concerto in E flat, Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody, "Espana," and the Tannhauser overture.

The hall was well filled, and the concert was, without doubt, the success artistically that it was financially. The reading of the overture was one of surpassing brilliancy and dramatic force, though there was, perhaps, a tendency to sentimentalize in the measures immediately following the trumpet calls. Mr. Bauer has never played with more virility and noble breadth than he did on this occasion. His performance will not be easily forgotten. He was recalled with an insistency which is rare even at these concerts, but wisely refrained from encores. The "Espana" again exerted its quick and irresistible fascination. At the close of the Tannhauser overture there was stormy applause and shouts of "bravo" for Dr. Muck, who had previously bade his men rise and acknowledge the tribute of the audience.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
...rom
...ddress
...ate

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston, May 1 and 2, respectively. He will take leave with the same program he used at his first appearance, in October, 1906, Beethoven's C minor symphony, and "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. It is an interesting coincidence that on April 29, this year, the orchestra is giving a concert in aid of the fund which is being raised for the benefit of the sufferers of the Chelsea, Mass., fire. Dr. Muck will conduct. On April 26, 1906, a similar concert was given in aid of the San Francisco sufferer. Had Symphony Hall not been in use for another concert on Sunday evening, the 28th, this concert would have been given on the corresponding Sunday of the other one.

...k, 1
APR 26 1908

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL.

Dr. Muck will end his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the public rehearsal and concert in Boston on May 1 and 2, respectively. He will take leave with the same programme he used at his first appearance in October, 1906, Beethoven's C-minor symphony and "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner. It is an interesting coincidence that on April 29 this year the orchestra is giving a concert in aid of the fund which is being raised for the benefit of the sufferers of the Chelsea, Mass., fire. Dr. Muck will conduct. On April 26, 1906, a similar concert was given in aid of the San Francisco sufferers. Had Symphony Hall not been in use for another concert on Sunday evening, the 28th, this concert would have been given on the corresponding Sunday of the...

DR. KARL MUCK.

Dr. Muck this week ends his engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His going is deeply regretted, for he has endeared himself as man and musician to the people of this city. He has also enlarged the glory of the orchestra in the cities visited each year, and he has been largely instrumental in spreading its fame both in this country and in Europe.

As a conductor he has displayed the highest qualities. As a disciplinarian he has maintained the high standard of mechanical proficiency that has long distinguished the orchestra, but he is neither a martinet nor a pedagogue. He has shown a most catholic taste in his choice of compositions for performance, and he has thus broadened our musical horizon. Whatever his personal taste may be, he has recognized the fact that the audience should be acquainted with the results of contemporaneous musical activity in whatever country, in whatever form, in whatever direction this activity may be exercised. At the same time he has treated with affectionate respect the classic composers who years ago, by their conservative contemporaries, were looked upon as dangerous radicals, if not pestilent revolutionaries. He has been a true interpreter; he has the rare gift of interpreting so that the hearer is face to face with the composer and able fully to understand the musical speech. The music is here not filtered through the individuality of the conductor. And as an interpreter Dr. Muck has been passionate and eloquent without extravagance, without any disturbing self-display.

Dr. Muck is more than an accomplished musician, more than a conductor of the first rank. He is a man of sound parts and brilliant acquirements; a man deeply interested in all that pertains to sociology; a man of singularly agreeable address and distinguished bearing. Furthermore, he has the great and saving sense of humor.

It would be a pleasure to think that Dr. Muck might sometime return to this city, where he is held high in honor, yet those nearest to him would not expect him to break faith with Emperor William, who has generously denied himself for the last two years. It is not surprising that the Emperor now wishes Dr. Muck to return to the duties of the office that he brilliantly adorns.

TARDIEU

The Strange Things He Saw at the Symphony Concerts, and the Strange Conclusions He Drew About Them, Dr. Muck, the Orchestra, the Programmes and the Audience—A Striking New Play by Brieux in Paris, with a First Act That the Reviewers Count a Masterpiece, and a Conclusion That Was Rewritten in a Night

Mr. Tardieu, the Parisian journalist, who lectured at Harvard last winter, and who is now writing his impressions of American life in his newspaper, Le Temps, certainly saw and heard strange things at our Symphony Concerts. He writes a paragraph or two about them in one of his recent letters, and the reader here in Boston may easily wonder whether he really attended a Symphony Concert, and, if not, where and how he received so much misinformation concerning them. American writers make strange discoveries in France, and French writers apparently are as fortunate—or as unfortunate—in America. Mr. Tardieu, for example, has seen several hundred listeners standing at each Symphony Concert—a sight vouchsafed only to his eyes in recent years on the Saturday nights (that he carefully specifies) in Symphony Hall. He further reports that seats at the Symphony Concerts—"or at least some of them"—are not particularly costly—a statement that is true of the second balcony on Friday afternoons, but that hardly holds of all the other places, alike at the afternoon and the evening concerts, when the premiums of the auctions are added to the fixed prices.

Then, after a sentence about Dr. Muck, as a "well-known German kapellmeister"—tritest of adjectives and title for a conductor who has been distinguished in Europe for a dozen years—the observant and discriminating Tardieu passes to the programmes. Presumably he examined them with care, since he flatly affirms that they are "severe and heavy." Mr. Tardieu is clearly entitled to his opinion, but he quickly leaves that safe ground for what he seems to believe are facts. The programmes, it seems, move in cycles; there are "Beethoven evenings," for example, and "Wagner evenings" with "more Wagner than Beethoven." Like the "standees" of Saturday nights, these "Beethoven evenings" are known exclusively to Mr. Tardieu; and the programme books of the Symphony Orchestra have shamelessly omitted all record of them. The only discoverable "Wagner evening" is the Pension Fund concert of last February, when Dr. Muck made a "Wagner programme," as Mr. Colonne and Mr. Chévillard do—and three or four times in a season—in Paris. And there is "more Wagner than Beethoven"! Exactly four pieces by Wagner—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Kaisermarch" have stood on the programmes of the regular Symphony Concerts in the two years in which Dr. Muck has been the conductor of the orchestra, and a chief grievance of those who resent his programmes has been his "neglect of Wagner." As for Beethoven, Dr. Muck has played eight of his nine symphonies, at least four of his overtures and two of his concertos.

Even now the discovering Tardieu is not content. "German music," it seems, "enjoys a monopoly with Dr. Muck." It does, indeed, as in the striking instances of Debussy, d'Indy, Franck, Lalo, Bizet, Tschaikovski, Glazounoff, Smetana, Sibelius Sinding Grieg, MacDowell, Loeffler and Chadwick. Then, to cap the climax, "Dr. Muck hardly practises the policy of the open door" in his programmes. Yet he has opened it so wide that a considerable part of his public has been complaining bitterly for months past of the excess of new pieces in the Symphony Concerts, and the mere figures of the record exceed those of any other conductor, in the whole existence of the Symphony Orchestra, for a similar length of time. Mr. Colonne, Mr. Chévillard and Mr. Marly are able and energetic conductors in Paris; they sprinkle their programmes with new pieces in the course of a year; but they keep no such "open door" to the music of all the schools as has Dr. Muck. We have run over their programmes of the current season as carefully we hope as Mr. Tardieu examined those of the Symphony Orchestra. The number of those new pieces, with each of the three Parisian orchestras, is less than that which our orchestra either under Dr. Muck or in the later years of Mr. Gericke has regularly played. Moreover, French composers have by far the largest share of these new pieces on the Parisian programmes. Here in Boston, for four years past, the door has been open—to keep Mr. Tardieu's figure—to the new music of the world.

Dr. Muck is rather the fashion, thinks Mr. Tardieu, and the "ovations that he receives"—ovations sems a very large word—are partly the conventional thing. Yet he is good enough to admit that one of the ablest and best-esteemed conductors of our time has "fine and nervous" qualities that justify his success, and that one of the finest orchestras in the world is accurate, but a little cold. We poor innocents in Boston have fancied otherwise, especially in the two years of Dr. Muck's leadership; some of us have even heard Parisians, who go oftener to concerts, perhaps, than does the busy Mr. Tardieu, praise its animation beside the indifference and routine of their own orchestras; but we are notoriously a complaisant folk, and as Mr. Tardieu remarks—not less complaisantly—musical taste is not yet as cultivated in the United States as it is in other countries. However, he is good enough to believe that three thousand "snobs" do not go every week to Symphony Hall to applaud music that wearies them; that fashion would not suffice to assemble such numerous and attentive audiences; that the musical taste of Boston is "already" secure; and that, here as elsewhere in America, it will gradually form itself. We have "enlightened amateurs" to help the process, but we have not—it is greatly to fear—such an "enlightened" observer as Mr. Tardieu.

D. KUNTZ,
First violin.

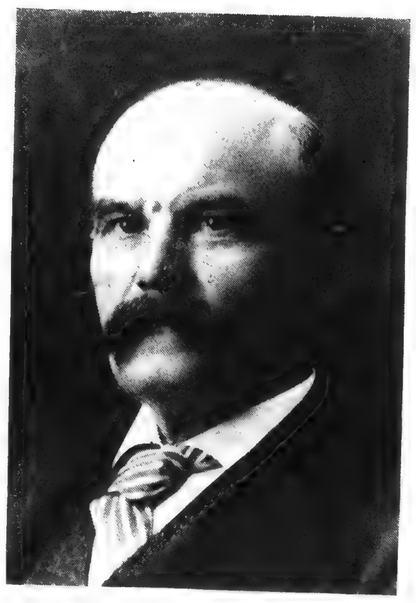
A. KUNTZ,
Second violin.

F. KNEISEL,
Concertmeister.

R. KURTH,
Second violin.

T. ADAMOWSKI,
First violin.

J. HOFFMAN,
First violin.



HERBERT J. BUTLER,
Bass viol.

E. ONDERICEK,
First violin.

E. FIEDLER,
First violin.

A. MOLDAUER,
First violin.

T. SCHNITZLER,
First violin.

H. BERGER,
Second violin.

H. SCHNECKER,
Harp.

C. HAMPE,
Trombone.

F. MAHN,
First violin.

A. SCHROEDER,
Violoncello.

C. BARLEBEN,
Viola.

A SAUTET,
Oboe.

E. LOEFFLER,
Violoncello.

E. ROSE,
Violoncello.

SOME OF THE LEADING MUSICIANS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

[195]

"Pop" Concert Season Opens Tuesday Night

ARTHUR KAUTZENBACH. GUSTAVE STRUBE.
THE TWO MUSICIANS WHO WILL CONDUCT "POP" CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL THIS SEASON.

The annual series of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, May 5, at 8 o'clock. This will be the twenty-third season of these entertainments. Owing to the convention here of the Federation of Women's Clubs the last of June, which will be held in Symphony Hall, the season of Pops will end June 20, and will last seven weeks, instead of the usual eight or nine. Every spring Boston is reminded of the fact that this is the only city in the country which has been able to support for a number of years concerts of this character. Such concerts are given in other cities, in parks, where they are one of several attractions, but Pop concerts, as such seem to flourish year after year only in Boston.

Owing to the retirement from the orchestra of Timothee Adamowski and Max Zach, who in the past have conducted a part of these concerts, the first part of the season will fall to Gustav Strube, who has usually conducted the last concerts, and the work will be shared with him by Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, who was brought from Germany by Dr. Muck last fall. Mr. Strube has been a conductor of the Pop concerts since the season of 1898, with the exception of one year. He has always been one of the most popular of the conductors, and to him in the past has usually fallen the job of conducting on the various college nights, and the success he has always had on these occasions has won for him many friends among the students at Harvard and Tech, who are among the most constant patrons of the Pops.

Mr. Strube, besides being one of the veteran members of the Symphony Orchestra, has won distinction for himself as a composer. One of the most popular marches that is played at the Pops is his "Cruiser Harvard" march, which he wrote during the Spanish War and which was played every night during that season.

Arthur Kautzenbach, who will share the work of conducting with Mr. Strube, is a young man of 26 and one of the 'cellists of the orchestra. He was born in Grottkau, in Silesia, on Jan. 16, 1882. His father was conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Reichenbach, and from him Mr. Kautzenbach had his first lessons. He is a graduate of the Hochschule in Berlin, where he was a pupil of Hausmann, and as 'cellist he has played in the principal orchestras of Berlin and Hamburg. He has also had considerable experience as a conductor.

The concerts, as usual, will be given on every week-day night at 8 o'clock, and they will end about eleven. The usual light refreshments will be served. The Tuesday night program is as follows:

Coronation March	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
Waltz Donauweibchen	Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, "La Boheme"	Puccini
Ballet music from "Gioconda"	Ponchielli
a. Berceuse for string orchestra	Strube
b. Humoreske	Dvorak
(First time.)
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Caprice Espagnol	Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)
Overture, "Raymond"	A. Thomas
Selection, "The Red Mill"	Herbert
Waltz, "The Merry Widow"	Lehar
March, "Flag of Victory"	Blon

Crush At Rehearsal Of The Symphony

Dr. Muck Receives Great Ovation at Last Afternoon Concert of the Season.

For the last Symphony rehearsal yesterday there was a crush and Dr. Muck received an unusually cordial greeting on entering and a decided ovation at the close. The customary subscribers were there, among them Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Frederick Comee, Mrs. William Fay and daughter Kitty, Mrs. Arthur Estabrook, Mrs. B. F. Pitman, Mrs. William Lindsay in gray with becoming hat of blue, Mrs. Nathan Matthews and daughter Nathalie, Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Kate Stevens Bingham, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Edwin J. Curtis in nattier blue tailored gown and large hat, Mrs. C. Dowse, Mrs. Henry P. Quincy, Mrs. John Reece, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. C. H. Greenleaf, Mrs. Thacher Loring, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and sister, Miss MacNichol, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Mrs. Fenno, Miss Helen Prince, Arthur Foote, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam and Mrs. Stanley McCormick.

MUSICAL MATTERS

"Pop" Concerts Begin This Week.

Dr Muck's Farewell as Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Grand Opera Coming to the Majestic Theatre.

The annual series of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony hall next Tuesday evening. This will be the 23d season of these entertainments, and it will be one of the shortest, for owing to the convention of the Federation of Women's Clubs the last of June, which will be held in Symphony hall, the Pops will end on June 20. Every spring Boston is reminded of the fact that this is the only city in the country which has been able to support for a number of years concerts of this character.

Such concerts are given in other cities in parks, where they are one of many attractions, but popular concerts as such seem to flourish year after year only in Boston. Many ask why they are not prolonged further into the summer, but experience has taught the management of the Boston symphony orchestra that after the end of June the attractions of outdoor life are too strong a rival to indoor concerts.

Owing to the retirement from the orchestra of Mr Timothee Adamowski and Mr Max Zach, who in the past have conducted a part of these concerts, the first part of the season will fall to Mr Gustav Strube, who has in the last few years conducted the last concerts. The work will be shared with him by Mr Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, who was brought from Germany by Dr Muck last fall.

Mr Strube has been a conductor of the Pop concerts since the season of 1898, with the exception of one year. He is now ending his 18th season with the orchestra, having been brought here by Arthur Nikisch. He was born in 1867 in Ballenstedt, and has won distinction as a composer, many of his works having been played here by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He also has distinguished himself as having composed one of the most popular marches that are played at the Pops—the "Cruiser Harvard" march, which he wrote during the Spanish war, and which was played every night during that season.

Mr Kautzenbach is one of the 'cellists of the orchestra. He was born in Grottkau, in Silesia, Jan 16, 1882. He has had considerable experience as a conductor. He conducted his father's orchestra in Reichenbach, and he was conductor of the Berlin Dilettante orchestra, a semi-professional organization, with which he had very considerable success.

The concerts, as usual, will be given on every weekday night, at 8 o'clock, and they will end about 11. The usual light refreshments will be served. The first program is as follows:

Coronation march	Meyerbeer
Overture, Si j'etais Roi	Adam
Waltz, Donauweibchen	Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, La Boheme	Puccini
Ballet music from Gioconda	Ponchielli
Berceuse for string orchestra	Strube
Humoreske	Dvorak
(First time.)
Overture, Rienzi	Wagner
Caprice Espagnol	Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)
Overture, Raymond	A Thomas
Selection, The Red Mill	Herbert
Waltz, The Merry Widow	Lehar
March, Flag of Victory	Blon

Last Symphony Concert.

Dr Muck's farewell program of the 27th Symphony season was a duplication of the one played at his first concert here when becoming conductor of the orchestra in October, 1906. It comprised Beethoven's fifth symphony and three selections from Wagner's compositions, a "Faust" overture, "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Mastersinger." The retirement of Dr Muck as leader of the orchestra has been the cause of such sincere regret that naturally the audience was unusually liberal in its applause, greeting the conductor warmly as he came upon the platform and displaying unwonted appreciation at every break in the program.

The performance of the impressive fifth symphony was one of those occasions when the conductor and players seem to be specially imbued with the spirit and intent of the composer, for Beethoven's grand work was given with all the poignant musical utterances requisite for illustrating the soul mysteries which he is supposed to express in this form.

The wonderful reiterated theme of the first movement which never becomes monotonous; the insistent and simple little phrases of the second part; the savage measures of the double-basses in the beginning of the next movement, and the prodigious finale—all are familiar. But one seemingly never would weary of hearing them as given by the orchestra, with all the shades of meaning set forth in glowing, passionate tonal colorings.

The Wagner pieces were well contrasted in sentiments and due justice was accorded each one in the manner of interpretation. The general somberness of the "Faust" overture enabled the heavier instruments to show their good qualities, and the joyous "Siegfried" idyl, with its dainty suggestions of motifs from other Wagner operas, mainly enlisted the skill of the performers of the lighter instruments. The pompous "Meistersinger" overture was given with commendable vigor and riotous effect, making a brilliant finale of the program and the season.

In the 24 programs the old and new schools were quite evenly divided in the 82 selections played. Of this number, 20 were given for the first time in Boston and six for the first time at these concerts. The seven works by Beethoven led the list of composers, with Mozart, Wagner and Schubert credited with four each, MacDowell and Brahms with three each, and the balance of the selections, about 57, allotted to 47 other writers.

The pianists, as usual, were first in the soloists, and numbered seven. There were but two vocalists, both contraltos, and both with hyphenated names, Miss Gerville Reache and Mme Schumann-Heink. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were the violinists, Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky, Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist, and Mr Ferir, who played the viola solos in Mr Strube's symphonic poems. Bischoff's symphony and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" each were repeated.

The 28th season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct 9, with Max Fiedler as conductor and Willy Hess as concert master.

R MUCK'S FAREWELL

Loving Cup Presented to Him by Orchestra.

Notable Demonstration on Leader's Last Night With Symphony.

Never in the history of Symphony hall, so far as the symphony concerts are concerned, has been seen such enthusiasm as last night when Dr Karl Muck ended his two years of service as conductor of the orchestra.

The ceremonies of leave-taking began before the concert, in the tuning room, when after Maj Henry L. Higginson had made his usual speech to the orchestra, thanking them for their work in the past year. Mr Muck was led to the front by Mr Wendling, the retiring concert master, and received from the orchestra a very handsome loving cup, suitably engraved. He took the gift with signs of deep emotion.

When he entered the hall for the concert orchestra and audience rose simultaneously to greet him and the orchestra gave him a fanfare of trumpets and drums. The applause continued for several minutes. The applause throughout the concert was of the same heartiness, and at the end Dr Muck was called out a half-dozen times.

Dr Muck leaves Boston next Thursday. He will go to Niagara Falls for a day or two, then to New York, whence he sails on the 12th.

HOME CLUB'S BREAKFAST.

[196]

"Pop" Concert Season Opens Tuesday Night

ARTHUR KAUTZENBACH. GUSTAVE STRUBE.
THE TWO MUSICIANS WHO WILL CONDUCT "POP CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL THIS SEASON.

The annual series of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, May 5, at 8 o'clock. This will be the twenty-third season of these entertainments. Owing to the convention here of the Federation of Women's Clubs the last of June, which will be held in Symphony Hall, the season of Pops will end June 20, and will last seven weeks, instead of the usual eight or nine. Every spring Boston is reminded of the fact that this is the only city in the country which has been able to support for a number of years concerts of this character. Such concerts are given in other cities, in parks, where they are one of several attractions, but Pop concerts, as such seem to flourish year after year only in Boston.

Owing to the retirement from the orchestra of Timothee Adamowski and Max Zach, who in the past have conducted a part of these concerts, the first part of the season will fall to Gustav Strube, who has usually conducted the last concerts, and the work will be shared with him by Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, who was brought from Germany by Dr. Muck last fall. Mr. Strube has been a conductor of the Pop concerts since the season of 1898, with the exception of one year. He has always been one of the most popular of the conductors, and to him in the past has usually fallen the job of conducting on the various college nights, and the success he has always had on these occasions has won for him many friends among the students at Harvard and Tech, who are among the most constant patrons of the Pops.

Mr. Strube, besides being one of the veteran members of the Symphony Orchestra, has won distinction for himself as a composer. One of the most popular marches that is played at the Pops is his "Cruiser Harvard" march, which he wrote during the Spanish War and which was played every night during that season.

Arthur Kautzenbach, who will share the work of conducting with Mr. Strube, is a young man of 28 and one of the 'cellists of the orchestra. He was born in Grottkau, in Silesia, on Jan. 16, 1882. His father was conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Reichenbach, and from him Mr. Kautzenbach had his first lessons. He is a graduate of the Hochschule in Berlin, where he was a pupil of Hausmann, and as 'cellist he has played in the principal orchestras of Berlin and Hamburg. He has also had considerable experience as a conductor.

The concerts, as usual, will be given on every week-day night at 8 o'clock, and they will end about eleven. The usual light refreshments will be served. The Tuesday night program is as follows:

Coronation March	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
Waltz Donauweibchen	Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, "La Boheme"	Puccini
Ballet music from "Gioconda"	Ponchielli
a. Berceuse for string orchestra	Strube
b. Humoreske	Dvorak
(First time.)
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Caprice Espagnol	Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)
Overture, "Raymond"	A. Thomas
Selection, "The Red Mill"	Herbert
Waltz, "The Merry Widow"	Lehar
March, "Flag of Victory"	Blon

Crush At Rehearsal Of The Symphony

Dr. Muck Receives Great Ovation at Last Afternoon Concert of the Season.

For the last Symphony rehearsal yesterday there was a crush and Dr. Muck received an unusually cordial greeting on entering and a decided ovation at the close. The customary subscribers were there, among them Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Frederick Comee, Mrs. William Fay and daughter Kitty, Mrs. Arthur Estabrook, Mrs. B. F. Pitman, Mrs. William Lindsay in gray with becoming hat of blue, Mrs. Nathan Matthews and daughter Nathalie, Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Kate Stevens Bingham, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Edwin J. Curtis in nattier blue tailored gown and large hat, Mrs. C. Dowse, Mrs. Henry P. Quincy, Mrs. John Reece, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. C. H. Greenleaf, Mrs. Thacher Loring, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and sister, Miss MacNichol, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Mrs. Fenno, Miss Helen Prince, Arthur Foote, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam and Mrs. Stanley McCormick.

MUSICAL MATTERS

"Pop" Concerts Begin This Week.

Dr Muck's Farewell as Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Grand Opera Coming to the Majestic Theatre.

The annual series of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony hall next Tuesday evening. This will be the 23d season of these entertainments, and it will be one of the shortest, for owing to the convention of the Federation of Women's Clubs the last of June, which will be held in Symphony hall, the Pops will end on June 20. Every spring Boston is reminded of the fact that this is the only city in the country which has been able to support for a number of years concerts of this character.

Such concerts are given in other cities in parks, where they are one of many attractions, but popular concerts as such seem to flourish year after year only in Boston. Many ask why they are not prolonged further into the summer, but experience has taught the management of the Boston symphony orchestra that after the end of June the attractions of outdoor life are too strong a rival to indoor concerts.

Owing to the retirement from the orchestra of Mr Timothee Adamowski and Mr Max Zach, who in the past have conducted a part of these concerts, the first part of the season will fall to Mr Gustav Strube, who has in the last few years conducted the last concerts. The work will be shared with him by Mr Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, who was brought from Germany by Dr Muck last fall.

Mr Strube has been a conductor of the Pop concerts since the season of 1898, with the exception of one year. He is now ending his 18th season with the orchestra, having been brought here by Arthur Nikisch. He was born in 1867 in Ballenstedt, and has won distinction as a composer, many of his works having been played here by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He also has distinguished himself as having composed one of the most popular marches that are played at the Pops—the "Cruiser Harvard" march, which he wrote during the Spanish war, and which was played every night during that season.

Mr Kautzenbach is one of the 'cellists of the orchestra. He was born in Grottkau, in Silesia, Jan 16, 1882. He has had considerable experience as a conductor. He conducted his father's orchestra in Reichenbach, and he was conductor of the Berlin Dilettante orchestra, a semi-professional organization, with which he had very considerable success.

The concerts, as usual, will be given on every weekday night, at 8 o'clock, and they will end about 11. The usual light refreshments will be served. The first program is as follows:

Coronation march	Meyerbeer
Overture, Si j'etais Roi	Adam
Waltz, Donauweibchen	Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, La Boheme	Puccini
Ballet music from Gioconda	Ponchielli
Berceuse for string orchestra	Strube
Humoreske	Dvorak
(First time.)
Overture, Rienzi	Wagner
Caprice Espagnol	Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)
Overture, Raymond	A Thomas
Selection, The Red Mill	Herbert
Waltz, The Merry Widow	Lehar
March, Flag of Victory	Blon

Last Symphony Concert.

Dr Muck's farewell program of the 27th Symphony season was a duplication of the one played at his first concert here when becoming conductor of the orchestra in October, 1906. It comprised Beethoven's fifth symphony and three selections from Wagner's compositions, a "Faust" overture, "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Mastersinger." The retirement of Dr Muck as leader of the orchestra has been the cause of such sincere regret that naturally the audience was unusually liberal in its applause, greeting the conductor warmly as he came upon the platform and displaying unwonted appreciation at every break in the program.

The performance of the impressive fifth symphony was one of those occasions when the conductor and players seem to be specially imbued with the spirit and intent of the composer, for Beethoven's grand work was given with all the poignant musical utterances requisite for illustrating the soul mysteries which he is supposed to express in this form.

The wonderful reiterated theme of the first movement which never becomes monotonous; the insistent and simple little phrases of the second part; the savage measures of the double-basses in the beginning of the next movement, and the prodigious finale—all are familiar. But one seemingly never would weary of hearing them as given by the orchestra, with all the shades of meaning set forth in glowing, passionate tonal colorings.

The Wagner pieces were well contrasted in sentiments and due justice was accorded each one in the manner of interpretation. The general sombreness of the "Faust" overture enabled the heavier instruments to show their good qualities, and the joyous "Siegfried" idyl, with its dainty suggestions of motifs from other Wagner operas, mainly enlisted the skill of the performers of the lighter instruments. The pompous "Meistersinger" overture was given with commendable vigor and riotous effect, making a brilliant finale of the program and the season.

In the 24 programs the old and new schools were quite evenly divided in the 82 selections played. Of this number, 20 were given for the first time in Boston and six for the first time at these concerts. The seven works by Beethoven led the list of composers, with Mozart, Wagner and Schubert credited with four each, MacDowell and Brahms with three each, and the balance of the selections, about 57, allotted to 47 other writers.

The pianists, as usual, were first in the soloists, and numbered seven. There were but two vocalists, both contraltos, and both with hyphenated names, Miss Gerville Reache and Mme Schumann-Heink. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were the violinists, Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky, Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist, and Mr Ferir, who played the viola solos in Mr Strube's symphonic poems. Bishoff's symphony and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" each were repeated.

The 28th season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct 9, with Max Fiedler as conductor and Willy Hess as concert master.

R MUCK'S FAREWELL

Loving Cup Presented to Him by Orchestra.

Notable Demonstration on Leader's Last Night With Symphony.

Never in the history of Symphony hall, so far as the symphony concerts are concerned, has been seen such enthusiasm as last night when Dr Karl Muck ended his two years of service as conductor of the orchestra.

The ceremonies of leave-taking began before the concert, in the tuning room, when after Maj Henry L. Higginson had made his usual speech to the orchestra, thanking them for their work in the past year. Mr Muck was led to the front by Mr Wendling, the retiring concert master, and received from the orchestra a very handsome loving cup, suitably engraved. He took the gift with signs of deep emotion.

When he entered the hall for the concert orchestra and audience rose simultaneously to greet him and the orchestra gave him a fanfare of trumpets and drums. The applause continued for several minutes. The applause throughout the concert was of the same heartiness, and at the end Dr Muck was called out a half-dozen times.

Dr Muck leaves Boston next Thursday. He will go to Niagara Falls for a day or two, then to New York, whence he sails on the 12th.

HOME CLUB'S BREAKFAST.

[196]

WHAT IS GOING ON IN THE MUSICAL

Edited by OLIN DOWNES

DR. MUCK'S FAREWELL

Dr. Muck bade farewell to his Symphony audiences at the last Symphony rehearsal and concert of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It was appropriate in more than one way, that he should choose for the final programme the familiar list with which he made his debut in this city: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, "Faust Overture," "A Siegfried Idyl" and the Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, 1906, Dr. Muck won immediate favor by his plastic, but incisive, electric performance of these pieces. He was then a new conductor, whose personality and methods differed widely from those of his predecessor. He was a fresh element, whose influence was quickly felt in the ranks of orchestra and audience. It was not strange that he was received so enthusiastically.

Yesterday, after a period of two years, there was not less of the magnetism and the communicating energy that were such inspiring features of the first performance. There was again the splendidly forceful and stirring reading of the Symphony, the finely conceived transition from the dark and mysterious measures of the scherzo to the final, and again the last movement, instead of impressing as anti-climax, which it almost always does, swept on with ever-increasing strength and glory to the end. Again there was the finely intuitive conception of the "Faust Overture," the color and richness of tone in the "Siegfried Idyl," the superb glow and youthful fire in the Meistersinger music. If there were anything that might mark the difference between the beginning and the end of two seasons, it was in the closer union that now exists between conductor and players, and as a result a perhaps even greater clearness and brilliancy of tone, quicker and more comprehensive understand of the leader's inmost desires.

Muck and his orchestra have continued to develop since the former's arrival in Boston.

Dr. Muck came here when his experience as a conductor had been chiefly in the operatic field. He found a superb orchestra awaiting him. Among the qualities that he brought to his work were conspicuous the elasticity and the quick insight into the very form of a score, the supple but decided beat of an experienced and gifted operatic conductor. It is probable, in fact, that he came without the most extensive and embracing knowledge of the modern orchestral repertoire. It is amusing to remember the fears expressed when the first four programmes of the season 1906-7 were published. It was apprehended that the Symphony audience would remain in utter darkness as far as modern composers were concerned. It is still more amusing to observe the complaints of this season, when there are those who declare that righteousness is departed and their ears are smitten unto deafness with the tone profanities of the moderns.

The impossibility, at any time, of gratifying the tastes of an entire audience in this respect is a matter of history. It can hardly be denied, however, that Dr. Muck is over-inclined to a programme of one color. It hardly seems necessary, for instance, that a Symphony audience, familiar with all the orchestral masterpieces, both classic and modern, need be prodded into comprehending that three epoch-making composers, Bach, Haydn and Mozart, followed each other in that chronologcial order, or that Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven were composers of what is known as the "classic" period. Nor has experiment proved it particularly desirable to have one week's programme consist entirely of Russian music, the next of compositions by French composers, etc. Such proceedings are too one-sided for most of us.

As the new conductor became acquainted with the extent of the orchestra's library and the traditions of the concerts he quickly broadened and diversified his lists, and he produced many important novelties. Among those of the first season that immediately came to mind are Mr. Frederick S. Converse's orchestral fantasy: "The Mystic Trumpeter," the most mature orchestral achievement by that composer; Debussy's "Sea Pieces," the latest orchestral works by Debussy to be heard here, and also the one of his works that has created the hottest discussion; a prelude and double fugue for strings, by Oscar Fried, a friend of Dr. Muck's, whose composition proved to be a masterly piece of writing, from both emotional and technical standpoints; Jean Sibelius' first symphony and his violin concerto, both works of exceeding originality and force, written by a man who, were it not for the most deplorable alcoholic indulgence, would now be a reigning musical influence in Europe; and last, but not least, Strauss' superbly human and poetic work, the "Symphonia Domestica."

This season has been richer. Recall Dr. George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," pieces of unusual vitality that are aglow with a strong and attractive personality; two works by D'Indy, the "Wallenstein Trilogy," after Schiller's drama, and the "Summer Day on a Mountain," given last week. Both of these were of unusual interest, the first, in especial, teeming with imagination. One of the most remarkable compositions produced under Dr. Muck's regime was Mr. Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, a unique and memorable achievement on the part of the composer. The Serenade by Max Reger, given last season, proved a harmless affair, but the Variations and Fugue performed this winter rank as one of the most colossal achievements of this period. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" was not as effective as it probably was at the time of its composition. Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra was interesting, ingratiating, and perhaps the strongest production of the young American composer of the present time. Ertel's "Midnight Review" was full of zest and fantasy. There must also be remembered Mr. Henry K. Hadley's Symphonic poem "Salome," and his third symphony; Bischoff's swollen symphony, and Gustave Strube's piquant "Fantastic Dance." In two seasons of 24 concerts this is a very fair percentage of important novelties that will continue to be valuable items in the index of the Symphony Library. On the other hand, it does seem a pity to have spent time and money on such things as Ritter's "Olaf's Wedding Dance," Humperdinck's overture to "The Forced Marriage," Bendix's fourth symphony, etc. Well, let the dead rest!

Dr. Muck has accomplished much since his first season. One thing for which he should be ardently thanked is his attitude toward soloists. A soloist is always an incongruous element in an orchestral programme, and a distraction to the serious musicians. There have been fewer of these impedimenta during the last two seasons than before in the history of the orchestra. There have also been fewer "Wagnerian excerpts," which are properly outside the domain of the concert hall. For such features of programme making we owe this conductor a debt of gratitude.

As an interpreter he has proved to possess those unusual qualities so necessary for a conductor of an institution such as the Boston Symphony; that rare union of its subjective and objective which enable the artist to first comprehend every iota of a composer's meaning and then to feel the musical impulse so keenly as to be able to reproduce, hot as from the creator's heart, the music in such a way that one seems present at the very creation of the work. This, with the "personal note" in sufficient evidence only to give the final, vital touch to the whole without the slightest jarring self-obtrusion. Truly, the man who can do this is greater than he who conquers a city. And Dr. Muck has accomplished such results, till we have almost grown to take them as a matter of course.

His self-forgetfulness has never been more apparent than in his study of scores that have confessedly been uncongenial to his taste. As if in fear of his own tendencies, no works have received more careful preparation than those directly repellant to him, and the performances of these works have been such as to almost make one doubt the sincerity of the interpreter's remarks.

It is not to be wondered at that these habits of the hardest, the most thorough and unremitting labor, the constant experience in handling such a superb body of instrumentalists, and the study of music of every school and period that circumstances necessitated, should have broadened and deepened the capacities of this broadly receptive man to a very appreciable degree. Musician as he was when he came, he departs with powers that are immensely matured and strengthened. His characteristic qualities have developed to a striking and remarkable degree. He returns to Europe, to use an irreverent phrase, "Twice the man he came!" Dr. Muck has done a great deal for the Symphony audiences, and still more for himself.

Opening of the Pop Concerts

MARCEAU PHOTO

GUSTAV STRUBE AND ARTHUR KAUTZENBACH CONDUCTORS AT POP CONCERTS

The annual series of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, May 5, at 8 o'clock. This will be the 23d season of these entertainments, and it will be one of the shortest. Owing to the convention here of the Federation of Women's Clubs the last of June, which will be held in Symphony Hall, the season of pops will end June 20, and will last seven weeks, instead of the usual eight or nine.

Owing to the retirement from the orchestra of Mr. Timothee Adamowski and Mr. Max Zach, who in the past have conducted a part of these concerts, the first part of the season will fall to Mr. Gustav Strube, who has in the last few years always conducted the last concerts, and the work will be shared with him by Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach, one of the new members of the orchestra, who was brought from Germany by Dr. Muck last fall. Mr. Strube has been a conductor of the Pop concerts since the season of 1898, with the exception of one year. He has always been one of the most popular of the conductors, and to him in the past has usually fallen the task of conducting on the various college nights, and his success on these occasions has won for him many friends among the students at Harvard and Tech, who are among the most constant patrons of these concerts.

Mr. Strube has won distinction for himself as a composer, many of his works having been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also has distinguished himself as having composed one of the most popular of the marches that are played at the Pops—the "Cruiser Harvard" march, which was written during the Spanish war, and played every night during that season.

Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach, who will share the work of conducting with Mr. Strube, is a young man of 26, and one of the 'cellists of the orchestra. He was born in Grottkau, in Silesia, on Jan. 16, 1882. His father was conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Reichenbach, and from him Mr. Kautzenbach had his first lessons. He is a graduate of the Hochschule in Berlin, where he was a pupil of Hausmann, and as 'cellist he has played in the principal orchestras of Berlin and Hamburg. He conducted his father's orchestra in Reichenbach, and he was conductor of the Berlin Dilettante Orchestra, a semi-professional organization, with which he had very considerable success.

The concerts, as usual, will be given on every week-day night, at 8 o'clock, and they will end about 11. The usual light refreshments will be served. The first programme follows:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi".....Adam
Waltz, "Donauweibchen".....Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Ballet Music from "Gioconda".....Ponchielli
(a) Berceuse for String Orchestra.....Strube
(b) Humoreske.....Dvorak
(First time.)
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Caprice Espagnole.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)
Overture, "Raymond".....A. Thomas
Selection, "The Red Mill".....Herbert
Waltz, "The Merry Widow".....Lehar
March, "Flag of Victory".....Blon

FAREWELL TO DR. MUCK

Never in the history of Symphony Hall, so far as the Symphony concerts are concerned, has been seen such enthusiasm as last night when Dr. Muck ended his two years of service as conductor of the orchestra. In the tuning room, previous to the concert, after Mr. Higginson had thanked the orchestra for their work in the past year, Dr. Muck was led to the front by Mr. Wendling, the retiring concert master, and received from the orchestra with deep emotion a very handsome loving cup, suitably engraved.

When he entered the hall for the concert orchestra and audience rose simultaneously to greet him, and the orchestra gave him a fanfare of trumpets and drums. The applause continued for several minutes.

Dr. Muck leaves Boston next Thursday.

Seven Christians have been buried for

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1908

"THE POPS" AGAIN

The New Series That Begins Next Tuesday

The "Pop" concerts, renewed for a twenty-third year, will begin in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, and continue there for seven weeks, through Saturday, June 20. The series is shorter than usual this spring, because a convention of the woman's clubs has taken Symphony Hall for the last week in June, while the academic year at Harvard ends early and the students who make a considerable part of the public of the concerts will be dispersed. The arrangements for the new series are practically those of past years. There will be a concert every evening, except Sundays, begining at eight and ending towards eleven; fifty-five men from the Symphony Orchestra will make the band, and the programmes will run along the lines of previous years. The conductors this spring will be Mr. Strube for the first weeks of the series, and Mr. Kautzenbach for the final weeks. For ten years Mr. Strube has been one of the conductors at the "Pops"; he is a familiar figure to the frequenters of them; and long ago he won his public there by equal liveliness and good nature. Mr. Kautzenbach is a younger man, and one of the new members of the orchestra that Dr. Muck brought to America last season. He is a 'cellist by profession; but he has also had considerable experience as a conductor in concerts of light music in Germany. At the least, he is a new blood, and new blood has been a rare thing in the "Pop" concerts. They have gone on successfully for twenty-two years in the familiar way, and thereby they have justified themselves. At least no similar venture in any other American city has lasted so long or succeeded so well. To return to the arrangements—tables will be set on the floor as in the past; the same sort of "refreshments" liquid and solid, will be served; and the prices alike for entrance, reserved seats, eatables and drinkables will remain as heretofore. The programme for the first concerts, follows, and notable upon it is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," one of the show pieces of the winter at the Symphony Concerts:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Si j'étais Roi".....Adam
Waltz, "Donauweibchen".....Strauss
Selection, "La Bohème".....Puccini
Ballet Music from "Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Berceuse for String Orchestra.....Strube
Humoreske.....Dvorak
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Caprice Español.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture, "Raymond".....A. Thomas
Selection, "The Red Mill".....Herbert
Waltz, "The Merry Widow".....Lehar
March, "Flag of Victory".....Blon

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, MAY 4, 1908.

SYMPHONY BIDS GOOD-BY TO DR. KARL MUCK

Remarkable Demonstration of Sorrow on Part of the Audience. Loving Cup From Players.

People who have followed the Symphony Orchestra from its foundation twenty-seven years ago say that the farewell reception given Dr. Karl Muck on Saturday night was the most impressive on record. In the first place, the audience rose up to greet him when he made his appearance, and no Symphony crowd ever did that before in honor of any man or women. There was enthusiastic applause after every number—after every movement, indeed; and then at the end the audience stood up again and clapped hands and cheered until the protege of Emperor William had come out to bow again and again. Some cried "Speech," but the most popular conductor the orchestra ever had only bowed the more. Perhaps he was too affected to speak. If he had spoken, by the way, the audience would have found that he can express himself very gracefully in English.

A fanfare from the orchestra was the first sign of the last night of the twenty-seventh season. Then band and crowd joined in a mighty greeting. The people remarked the enthusiasm of the orchestra. The secret of this is that the men of this famous organization have almost idolized Dr. Muck. He was a man whose varied talents commanded the utmost respect, yet he never was dictatorial or inconsiderate. So the men were sorry, indeed, to have him go. They called upon him before the concert and said so and they gave him a loving cup as proof of their affection and esteem. Strange to say, Mr. Wendling, the concert master, who made the speech of presentation, also made his last appearance Saturday night.

The program of this last concert was the same as that which Dr. Muck arranged for his debut a year ago last October. It consisted of Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner pieces—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

The opening concert of the twenty-eighth season will be given Saturday, Oct. 10, with Max Fiedler as conductor.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1908

DR. MUCK IN REVIEW

HIS TWO YEARS OF WORK IN BOSTON

The Symphony Orchestra as He Received It and the Symphony Orchestra as He Leaves It—The New and Vital Qualities That He Has Infused Into Its Playing—Their Source in the Man Himself—His Distinguishing Qualities of Mind and Temperament—The Standards He Has Set for Himself and the Artistic Honor and Conscience With Which He Has Followed Them—The Broadening Influence Upon Dr. Muck of His Work Here—The Memory That He Leaves His Public

Mr. Gericke left the Symphony Orchestra perfect instrument; Dr. Muck has given the instrument a living voice. On its technical side, in the widest and the finest—the dealizing—sense of the words, the Symphony Orchestra was, and is, the work of Mr. Gericke's hands. Year after year, in his long service as its conductor, he trained it to the unanimity of attack, the precision of accent, the balance, euphony and beauty of tone, the smoothness and adroitness of phrasing, the sensitiveness to rhythm, the surety and the elegance of utterance, that gradually became its distinguishing and lasting qualities. A band can hardly play more beautifully than did the orchestra in the last years of Mr. Gericke's régime. It passed so to Dr. Muck, and in the two years in which he has been its conductor there has been no lessening of these virtues. There were occasions, in the transitional time, while the orchestra was learning to know its new conductor and he, no less, was sounding it, when these traits seemed to be clouded or even waning. Long before the end of Dr. Muck's first year in Boston they were clear and strong again, and it was no less plain that he cherished them equally with his predecessor. Then by many of the changes that he made in the personnel of the band last autumn he still further strengthened them. From the beginning Dr. Muck has permitted his men a freedom of means and method that they knew not under Mr. Gericke; he has left them as individuals more to themselves; he has never nagged them with his insistence; but the results that he has demanded were essentially the same. The very ends that he would accomplish—the living voice that he would gain—depended on the perfection of the instrument. Again, the orchestra is to pass to a new conductor and again it passes fully clothed with its technical virtues. More: each and all of these virtues has been heightened by the new vitality that now underlies and animates them.

Towards the end of Mr. Gericke's conductorship, and in the last year in particular of his work here, he had brought the orchestra to the technical ideal that he had sought. He had, then, only to safeguard it and to use all the excellences that it implied towards a larger eloquence, a warmer feeling and a more intense utterance. Steadily, in his final series of concerts, he heightened and amplified the expressive quality of the band, and there were memorable performances—still easy to recall after two years—of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," for example, of Tschaikovski's "Francesca," of Schubert's, Schumann's and Franck's symphonies. Then, at exactly the psychological moment, Dr. Muck succeeded him. Practically Dr. Muck had made his career as an operatic conductor. That career had given him an acute sense of the effect to be gained, of the dramatic quality that stirs in most music, of the necessity that each and every piece shall "sound" and so communicate its own substance, emotion, and peculiar eloquence. In the opera house, the conductor must strike fire, and Dr. Muck had no sooner succeeded to our orchestra than he began to strike fire from it. He made its precision and unanimity more alert; its command of rhythm and of accent more nervous; he warmed and deepened its phrasing; he stirred its elegance into brilliance. Its surety in all things remained, but he made it a bolder and more spontaneous surety. The beauty of its performance was no less; but thereto he added a new power. The results, continuing through the two years of his conductorship, have been a larger, richer and more varied eloquence in the playing of the orchestra; a new ability to characterize with its peculiar traits the music in hand; a new poignancy and intensity of musical speech; a new vividness of impression and a new thrill of answering emotion in us that listened. The orchestra has been more alive, sensitive, dramatic and expressive than it had been before. It has gained a nervous temperament; it has become more emotional; it steadily strikes fire. By the magic that is the secret of a conductor's power over his men, Dr. Muck has remade his band in his own image. Mr. Gericke left it as perfect a technical medium as a human thing can well be. Dr. Muck leaves it as perfect an expressive means.

Dr. Muck has conceived himself no less than his orchestra as a means of expression. One sort of conductor invites his hearers to receive his impressions of the music that he chooses, to listen to Mozart or Beethoven, Tschaikovski or d'Indy, after they have passed through his temperament. He plays upon his men as some pianists play upon their instruments, in order that the orchestra may express himself quite as much as the composer whose name stands upon the programme. These are the "temperamental," the "interpretative" conductors. Those of another sort regard themselves as only means to an end—and that end is the clearest and fullest communication of the contents of the music in hand as the composer wrought and felt it. These conductors approach a given piece, be it a simple symphony by Haydn or an intricate tone-poem by Strauss, with an eye single to its peculiar traits. They apprehend its structure, assimilate its substance, penetrate its moods, assort and adjust its details to its underlying or dominating musical and poetic content, discover its peculiar traits, accent and eloquence, and then to their utmost seek to communicate all these things to their hearers. They differentiate each piece that they undertake from all the rest. They give to each its individual voice. Dr. Muck has been such a conductor. In his tempi, his accentuation, his phrasing, his rhythm, his contrasts and climaxes, he has sought only the substance, the spirit, the peculiar life of the music as it came from the composer's hand. His personal distinction has been to be impersonal before his music, but not impersonal in the negative sense. Rather, he has had as many personalities as there have been composers and pieces on his programmes. He has made himself and his orchestra the eloquent and the characterizing voice of each. No conductor of our band has seemed to have so few limitations of sympathetic understanding and answering emotion.

The secret of this discrimination, this truly interpretative quality, this self-subordination lies, perhaps, in the qualities of Dr. Muck as a man as well as a musician. His work has proved him, as his friends know him to be, a man of strong and fine intellect, of alert, nervous and sensitive mind. He was schooled in the liberal studies; he knows other arts than the one that he practises; he has lived in the world of cultivated men and not merely in the world of makers of music; he looks upon life shrewdly and humorously. He has the penetrating, discriminating and ordering mind that springs from mental organization and mental training. He understands before he feels, and the breadth and the fineness of his understanding he has proved from Bach through the composers of our own particular place and hour. Mental qualities alone make only a dry conductor. He must have emotional understanding and responsiveness as well. On this score, again as his work has proved him and as his friends know him to be, Dr. Muck is no less finely strung. His is the alert, sensitive, nervous spirit that enters into the moods and the emotions of the symphony, the tone-poem, or the concert piece before him, and that seizes and reflects them vividly and vitally. As he has proved time and again, he is sensitive alike to the varied poetry, the varied drama, the whole range of the expressive quality of music. He has kept it an emotional speech. Such a union of mental and emotional qualities do not in themselves round a conductor. He must add to them the intrinsically musical qualities—the feeling for beauty and poignancy of tone, for musical design and form and ornament, for the underlying and characterizing melody, for the songful utterance, for the charm and the power of ordered sound. Dr. Muck has had no less this purely musical sensitiveness. He is the man of intellect, the man of feeling, who has found the conducting of music the normal and instinctive outlet for these qualities. His mental, emotional and musical traits have been so poised in him that he has been at once the most intellectual, dramatic and songful, thus far, of our conductors.

Such a man and musician naturally brought high standards and large open-mindedness to the task that he undertook here. From the beginning to the end he has concentrated himself upon his work. He has trusted to no happy "inspiration" in the performance of new music and none of his predecessors has played so much new music in two seasons as has he. To every piece of it, he has given the closest of study so that he could bring it to performance with the utmost clearness of understanding and imagination. He has studied and restudied music already familiar to him, and no conductor hitherto has marked the parts that stand before the men so fully and minutely as has he. By day and by night he has pursued these and similar tasks—routine tasks indeed—and in the face of twenty opportunities for more amusing and stimulating occupation. He has been insistent that his men should work as diligently and unreservedly as he; he has scrutinized them closely; he has held them to an exacting standard. But he has never "nagged" nor driven, irritated nor exhausted them. He has stimulated them to his own eagerness and buoyancy of spirit, been quick to praise and won and kept them liking. He has required the best that was in them, as he in turn, gave the best that was in him to them and to his audiences. He has kept the discipline of the orchestra, but he has treated it as a body of men, and not as so many levers and wheels in a musical machine. The new vitality in its playing has not been the least of the rewards of this wisdom. Dr. Muck has been no less mindful of his obligation to his audiences. They have the just right to expect the utmost within a conductor's power, but they can neither know nor consider the chance and hampering circumstance, the moment when the flesh and the spirit alike falter, when the vein and the mood will not come. Dr. Muck, like all highly-strung men, has had these besetting and dulling moments. He has oftenest conquered them and he has never spared himself.

Whether Dr. Muck has made his programmes wisely, whether he has put too much new and strange music upon them are matters that it is useless to debate now. In both he has acted according to his understanding, and with the highest of standards. He believes in the unified programme—the programme that has a consistent and continuing character. He likes the classic grouping of overture, concerto and symphony. He does not believe that the music of the opera house, though Wagner himself may have written it, should have much place in the concert-room. He has little liking for the short and fragmentary orchestral piece. He has made his programmes accordingly. His listeners have liked or disliked them, as inclination prompted. The conductor, meantime, has gone his way, justly confident that whatever their shortcomings, they were in accord with the purpose and the quality of the Symphony Concerts. Early he discovered that catholicity had been one of the distinguishing qualities of the programmes in the last years of Mr. Gericke's conductorship. Precedent and expectation, he found, asked no less catholicity of him and thereafter he steadily kept to it.

It is the high standard that Dr. Muck h set for himself and for his audiences t at bottom prompted him to the playing so many new pieces, especially in the second year of his conductorship. He gave the classics, ancient and modern, their due place and—what is better—set them as living things therein; vital with the qualities that have made them classics and not exhibits in a musical museum. He conceived it, no less, to be the duty of the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra to keep its public informed of the music that living composers of all schools were writing at the moment. He regarded it as a duty he owed to the art and to the progress of music to bring such new pieces to hearing. He believed it incumbent on the Symphony Orchestra, with its established prestige and its ample resources, so to encourage these composers. His own personal taste for the music that he so chose, his own opinion of it, he altogether waived. He was fulfilling, as he rightly believed, an obligation to his position and his public when he brought this new French, German and American music to performance. His fine honor, his scrupulous conscience as an artist bade him choose and hold to the course that he has followed. So convinced, there was for him no other way.

Dr. Muck came to Boston an eminent conductor, leaving for the time one of the distinguished positions of Germany. He came o a no less distinguished position in its kind in America. He returns to Berlin a still more eminent conductor, and, by many a token, of riper, warmer and finer powers. The Dr. Muck whom we in Boston knew first in the autumn of 1906 is not altogether the Dr. Muck who conducts for the last time here, so far as present signs go, tonight. It is in the second year of his service that he has carried our orchestra farthest in its new eloquence, fire and brilliance, and that he has most clearly disclosed the qualities that have individualized him among our conductors, under the quickening of his mind and spirit by new conditions and new opportunities. For his first season here he was a German conductor, borrowed from Berlin, to practise his art in a Boston of which he knew little. For the second season he has been the broader-minded and quicker-spirited, more sympathetic and understanding conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who happens now to be returning to Germany. Dr. Muck's reputation was European when he came; it is international when he goes, and it is a reputation based upon no other thing than the fulness of his achievements and the fineness of his standards. The tall, spare figure, the sharply cut features, the bright, clear eyes, the firm chin, with their mingled suggestion of mental keenness, sensitive feeling and aristocratic poise; the alert and concentrated air; the quiet incisiveness and the clear authority of tense gesture; the absorption in the task in hand and the sincere self-subordination in all things will linger long in the recollection of the audiences of the Symphony Concerts, and in their image of the man and the conductor they will recall his signal traits.

H. T. P.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 4, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Fifth Symphony.
Wagner—"Faust" Overture.
Wagner—"Siegfried" Idylle.
Wagner—"Mastersingers" Prelude.

"All things have an end, except a sausage, which has two," says Fritz Reuter. On Saturday the short reign of Dr. Carl Muck as our symphonic conductor came to its close. It has been a most brilliant one. Dr. Muck is one of those geniuses who can play upon the orchestra as upon an instrument. He has clear ideas regarding the interpretation of the masters, and he understands how to bring out the spirit of even the compositions that do not appeal to him. He has made some of the greatest successes in interpreting certain works of the most modern school, with which he is not in sympathy.

This is one of the severest tests of the modern conductor. No musician can be cordially in sympathy with all of such diverse works as those of Mahler, Bischoff, Reger, Debussy, Loeffler, D'Indy, the new Russian school, Richard Strauss, etc., etc. Yet it is but right that all of these important factors of the music of the present should have a hearing. Dr. Muck not only gave them a hearing, but it was impossible to tell which of these he disesteemed, so carefully and so sympathetically were all these contrasted works interpreted. It is probable that he took the greatest care in the performance of just those celebrated modern compositions which he liked the least, so that they should not suffer by his personal distaste.

The public showed most demonstratively that they appreciated what had been done for them in the past two years by Dr. Muck, and when he appeared the entire audience rose and burst into vehement applause, while the orchestra joined in the tribute by blowing a "Tusch" in honor of their departing conductor. At the close of the concert the audience again rose, not to depart, but to give another tribute as its farewell.

Under such circumstances one ought not to write a cold-blooded analysis of details of the performance, but join heartily in the ovation extended. Yet a little of comparative criticism may be permitted even on such a festal occasion. There was a quicker tempo taken in the first movement of the Beethoven symphony than we are accustomed to; it was quicker even than Dr. Muck's own reading of it when he made his first appearance here. It may be more than a coincidence, that Dr. Muck began and ended his Boston conductorship with Beethoven's fifth symphony. It was also the work with which Mr. Gericke took his leave of us.

With the reading of the initial phrase, which Beethoven compared to Destiny knocking at the Door, we are cordially in sympathy. Many conductors distort this part of the work by trying to make it too heroic. Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest, and there is no warrant for the separation of the figures in the affected manner in which it is often given. But we do not think the movement gained much by the general acceleration of tempo which was given it on this occasion.

The beauty of the variations of the second movement, the mock heroics of the Scherzo, the bassoon-work in the finale of the second, the contrabass work in the Trio of the Scherzo, and the brilliancy of the Finale, really heroic this time, all call for praise.

The whole programme might be taken as an index of our conductor's personal tastes in music. We fancy that his ideal musical kingdom is bounded by Bach, Brahms, Beethoven and Wagner, for all that he has won great successes in every possible domain of symphonic and orchestral music.

The Wagner works were superbly played. The "Siegfried" idylle does not grow upon us by repetition. It is greater than Wagner's marches and inferior to his Preludes. The "Faust" overture, on the contrary, gains by closer acquaintance. Yet we do not rank it above Liszt's orchestral portrayal of the Goethe subject.

The end came triumphantly with the best Vorspiel that Wagner ever composed. It was a fitting note of Victory, this ending of the final programme, and it fitted the triumph, too, which Dr. Muck has won in America. There have been very few discordant notes during this consulship. The complaints of some concert-goers, that there was too little of the classics and too much of dissonant and puzzling novelty, was the most unkindest cut of all, for Dr. Muck loved some of these works as little as those who suffered in the audience; but it was a duty to give them.

Our symphony concerts are not merely a passing pleasure, like a comedy at the theatre; the dignity of possessing the best orchestra of America carries some duties along with it. We owe it to musical education that this leading organization of our country should make its programmes an epitome of the orchestral repertoire of the world. Our concerts must reflect not only the acknowledged successes of the past and present, but also the strivings and experiments that are making musical history just now.

We are passing through a transition period in Music as well as in Literature, and must, unfortunately, listen to, and study, many things which we fondly believe the future will discard. Dr. Muck is to be thanked therefore for his broad-minded treatment of this subject and for not limiting the programmes by his likes or dislikes. For this and for the zeal our conductor has always displayed in advancing the cause of American music, for the brilliancy with which he has taught us new points even in familiar works (such as Brahms' C minor symphony), for the faithfulness with which he has sustained the high standard of our Symphony concerts, we lift up "the still, small voice of Gratitude."

Louis C. Elson.

[198]

SYMPHONY MUSIC AND ITS CRITICS

What Appears Mediocre t... One Generation May Thrill Another.

DR. MUCK'S SELECTIONS HAVE BEEN OF BEST

Many Composers Whose Contemporaries Quite Misjudged Them.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Last Sunday we considered the nature of some of the objections against the character of Dr. Muck's programmes and at the same time called attention to Mr. William Wallace's "Threshold of Music," published by the Macmillan Company. Mr. Wallace's argument that the musical sense is at present only in the first stages of development bears with particular significance on the subject of Dr. Muck's programmes, which, as the complainers say, have been "too modern."

We parted company with Mr. Wallace for a week, after he had discussed the endeavors of Monteverde and his school to employ music as a means for getting a little nearer the human heart. They were as unwilling as is Mr. Wallace, to admit that music is "useless" as certain scientific men assert.

Monteverde made music expressive by this direct appeal, without reverence for the established formulas, and by his use of color in orchestration. Bach laid the foundation of our modern system of harmony, and this system, it should be remembered, was in turn formulated for practical purposes only as recently as the latter half of the 18th century. The scope of music was thus enlarged. Bach's musical sense was developed more highly than that of any one of his predecessors; "but, although he was able to assure himself that a hitherto enchanted world of sound lay beyond comprehension, he hesitated to go in search of it. He demonstrated his theorem, but neglected to put it into practice." The organ played an important part in his music, and there were practical difficulties about its tuning. He was obsessed by counterpoint, which repressed much of his own true feeling. "So that a composition often became merely a dissertation in the language of music, amazingly ingenious and intricate, but for the most part devoid of human and emotional purport."

We must beware, as Mr. Wallace well says, of the enthusiasms that are founded on tradition. "It is not difficult for a man destitute of all creative power to build up by rule a vast and imposing erection of counterpoint. The framework of the contrivance, in the elemental forms which are perpetrated even in our own day, must consist of a series of closely related, interlocking parts, which permit of an unobstructed flow of conventional embroidery." The harmonic base must be of the simplest kind, and today the more chromatic the structure, the less easy it is to apply strict contrapuntal principles. "Hence a choral work carried out on orthodox lines cannot be anything else than a lavish imitation of devices whose possibilities were exhausted years ago."

Nor was Bach's sense of orchestral color developed much in advance of those before him. "Every instrument was treated with the same impartiality, worrying out some counterpoint with a sublime disregard for its appropriateness." The truth of Mr. Wallace's statement must be apparent to all. Rossini has been censured for his "olympian indifference" displayed in the lack of appropriateness of the music he often set to a given text. Bach was as great an offender in this respect. Nevertheless Bach possessed a "fluidity of thought and a swiftness of idea" known for the first time, and this, in spite of the fact that "a close analysis of nine-tenths of his work might show much that is mechanical, possibly even labored." He was the first, says Mr. Wallace, to demonstrate "the intimate yet indefinable association of sound with mental processes." Music to him was a fixed habit of thought rather than an art, and it might be added that Bach thought and moved and lived in counterpoint.

In the chapter "The Luthier and His Art," Mr. Wallace describes the gradual change in orchestral instruments, and notes the time when the ear began to decide which were to survive as fittest. "Beethoven and the composers immediately preceding him owe not a little of their reputation to a refinement of technique and a study of mechanical devices which came into use after they were in their graves. The notes that they wrote had the same theoretical relation then as now, but the actual sounds which they conveyed to the ear of the mind are not the same."

It should be remembered that Bach was neglected by his immediate successors, and this shows that he was in advance of his time; also that "the musical faculty had yet to be developed in order that there should be widespread recognition and appreciation of his genius." In his best choral music he showed that his imagination was influenced by great thoughts.

On the other hand, the instrumental works of Haydn and Mozart show little conception.

"Obvious, trivial and superficial is their style from a modern standpoint. . . . It is music that saves man the trouble of having to think; it is not music that compels him to do so." Mozart was far ahead of Bach in opening the way for the development of musical forms and the treatment of the orchestra; "he was far behind him in comprehending the vast realities," and it should not be forgotten that Mozart, unlike Beethoven, Weber, Berlioz, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, Loeffler, d'Indy, showed little interest in anything outside his art, or in comprehension of them. Haydn and Mozart possessed chiefly the constructive faculty. When they died, the musical sense, "in comparison with its developments in later years, was still in a primitive state as regards the expression of musical ideas."

Beethoven was a thinker. "It was not till he came that music assumed that wider aspect which we accept so unthinkingly today. Yet we are as far beyond his musical sense in one direction as we are close to it in another." His style is "referable to definite periods of his existence."

Haydn and Mozart trusted more to technique, than to the scope and possibilities of their art. They carried further the principles of design and thus prepared the way for Beethoven, who brought his faculty of music into correlation with other mental processes and seemed to be eternally engaged in a titanic struggle to express the strenuous but inarticulate thoughts to which his humanity and experience gave birth. The earlier style culminated with Beethoven; the modern movement starts with him, for the composer was becoming conscious that his gift had an intellectual value.

"Thus an entirely new aspect of art came into existence after 1830. The reign of the mathematician was over; there was no longer need for that composer, who, without special aptitude, could be so trained in the exercise of rule-of-thumb that he could contrive some kind of music painfully correct, never ugly, but invariably dull. His sovereignty was challenged by a new order of brain."

Berlioz was not blessed with "a sound musical education." Born in a restless age, he thought for himself. He had probably heard little or no music worth hearing until he was 19 years old. "He is the first composer that we meet with whose musical sense arose sporadically, and not only was uninfluenced by surroundings, but also declared itself impetuously in spite of hostile conditions." The Aeneid, Shakespeare, Goethe's "Faust" and the literature of the romanticists impelled him to write music. Had he studied in the orthodox manner "he might have been turned into a fifth-rate violinist or a 'professor' of music at some girls' school; he certainly would never have become our Berlioz." His music, even in its earliest stages, is singularly original, individual.

"In his conception of sound, Berlioz put in play three agents: the verbal and visual were combined with the auditory, and the last, in any age that the world has seen, would rightly be regarded as abnormal. His power of realizing sound in silence must have been colossal, for we know that he was too poor an executant to be able to try over his effects on a piano. Yet his ideas occurred to him at a time when orchestral music was in its infancy, when the suspicion of a discord in a score would have caused a strike among the players more swiftly than a trades union manifesto does in modern times. He felt the 'genius' of the orchestra more potently than any one who had gone before him, and, although he had none of the experience of Beethoven, he showed in his first important work a technical mastery which was almost superhuman. We must remember that when Berlioz produced his 'Symphonie Fantastique' he was at an age younger than Beethoven was when he wrote his first Mozartian symphony, and what is still more remarkable between these compositions there was a space of only 30 years."

Thus Berlioz, with Cellini and Whistler, belong to all countries and to all time, as Mr. Wallace thinks, for the three fought against the obtuseness that enslaved their contemporaries; "each saw that convention was merely transient and arbitrary and a frail obstacle to the march of the human faculties." They will live by their aims, irrespective of the artistic performance of their work.

Wagner was nearly 40 years old before he "found himself," but age in everything is relative. "Verdi, when he wrote his 'Falstaff' was a mere lad of four score years. Many a modern composer is too much of a centenarian at 20." Wagner's individuality was so strong that he seemed to be the incarnation of all the musical activity of his age.

Since he died music seems to have a new aspect, but it is not safe to assign too definite limits to any stage in its development. "For a mode of musical thought which a more staid contemporary opinion regarded as violent and revolutionary has eventually come to be considered as an advance so gentle and imperceptible that a later generation may well wonder why it ever caused a stir." Music is always in a state of transition.

"We are only on the threshold, and those who bar the way forget that the movement of music has behind it one invincible ally, namely, time. Therefore in this young and green art, which in the history of man is scarcely in its teens, it would be absurd were any one to take upon himself the duty of guide since the march of the faculty for music has as yet known no check."

"The new phase of music is seeking new outlets; it is not content with the old narrow limits, and no one can arrive at the 'ethical significance' of any kind of music until all that we today call music has been swept out of existence. We are only paving the way: We are at the stage of the cave-dweller with his tusk of ivory scratched with his flint. When sound has been resolved into terms which, with our ever progressing cerebral development, will convey a definite impression to the brain, and when that kind of music has entered into close and intimate association with reason—when, ages hence, this occurs it will be time enough to talk of the ethical significance of music."

I have quoted freely from Mr. Wallace's remarkable book for the benefit chiefly of those hearers who are deeply interested in what was done long ago, who are suspicious of what is doing today if it be not along familiar lines; who are hopeless about the future if future music is to follow the various paths indicated by Franck, Gabriel Faure, Strauss, d'Indy, Loeffler, Debussy. I have quoted in the hope that these hearers and complainers will be induced to read the whole of the book, for there are many pages of importance to which I have not referred in any way; that having read this book, they will begin to think for themselves; that thinking they will examine into the history of music even in their own parish. Let them, for example, look over the volumes of Dwight's Journal of Music which may be done easily in the Brown room of the Public Library. They will then see that here in Boston music that to them is now agreeable and orthodox was described by the hearers as noisy, unintelligible, monstrous, dull, when it was first performed here.

Complainers urged Dr. Muck to put more orchestral pieces by Schubert on his programmes. How many orchestral pieces by Schubert are tolerable today? The "Unfinished" symphony, the great and long symphony in C major, some of the "Rosamunde" music. Have not the two symphonies been played here many times? Dr. Muck led them last year. Must the two be performed at the Symphony concerts every year?

A week ago Saturday night Dr. Muck with a fine sense of humor, put an early symphony by Schubert on the programme for the enjoyment of the complainers. The symphony is a youthful work that should be buried forever. Repetitions of tiresome formulas, themes of little significance, not one emotional stroke, not one brilliant page! Why should the superb orchestra be asked or expected thus to waste its time? But there is no doubt that some in the audience preferred this instrumental chatter to the poetic and eloquent music of Vincent d'Indy that followed. They were honest in their preference. Were they not prejudiced and intolerant toward music which they made little effort to appreciate?

Perhaps they do read about the history of music. They fail to learn the one great lesson: That there is constant development; that new forms and new combinations which at first surprise and perplex, grow familiar, become classic and no longer appeal keenly to the new generation. Neither music itself nor the criticism of music is something constant.

"When I was a child," said Paul the Apostle, "I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things." There are hearers who will not pass beyond the state of childish enjoyment. After attending Symphony concerts for 25 years, their receptivity is no greater than it was in 1883. The serious-minded men of great talent, who today are devoting their lives to the full and free expression of their thoughts in music are Nihilists or lunatics, because, forsooth, they do not speak habitually the language that is merely as a common medium, without the vivifying power of genius, was out of worn long ago.

There will always be some who stand in awe of a name; who believe in the plenary inspiration of a dead composer reckoned by common consent as among the immortals, as immortals are now named, though the immortals themselves are not a fixed or determined body for all time; some have been obliged to put on mortality. Anything by Beethoven must be "satisfying" and noble. Anything by Mozart must be "tender and beautiful." There are always some who might say with the honest bourgeois:

Et vous, gens de l' art,
Pour que j'en jouisse
Quand c'est du Mozart
Que l'on m'avertisse!

An examination of the programmes of the last two years will show that Dr. Muck has at the same time respected the classics and given the contemporaneous composers a hearing. It is not necessary to insist on this point. It would also be unfair to argue concerning his own personal taste from the character of his programme. He has been governed in his choice of unfamiliar works for performance solely by the wish to make the audience acquainted with the purposes, tendencies, endeavors and results of modern, contemporaneous musical activity. He considered it his duty to do this as conductor of a great orchestra in a city that plumes itself on its interest in art.

OPENING OF THE POP CONCERTS IN SYMPHONY HALL.

The annual series of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock. This will be the 23d season of these entertainments, and it will be one of the shortest. Owing to the convention here of the Federation of Women's Clubs, the last of June, which will be held in Symphony Hall, the season of Pops will end on June 20, and will last seven weeks, instead of the usual eight or nine. Every spring Boston is reminded of the fact that this is the only city in the country which has been able to support for a number of years concerts of this character. Such concerts are given in other cities, in parks, where they are one of many attractions, but popular concerts as such, seem to flourish year after year only in Boston.

The conductor's work in the first part of the season will fall on Mr. Gustav Strube, who has in the last few years always conducted the last concerts, and the work will be shared with him by Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach.

Mr. Strube has been a conductor of the Pop concerts since the season of 1898, with the exception of one year. He has always been one of the most popular of conductors, and to him in the past has usually fallen the job of conducting on the various college nights. Mr. Strube is now ending his 18th season with the orchestra.

He was born in 1867 in Ballenstedt, and entered the Leipsig Conservatory when he was 18 years old. He was in Leipsig for five years, during which time he was a member of the Gewandhaus orchestra and a member of the Opera House orchestra. After leaving Leipsig, he went to Mannheim as a teacher in the conservatory.

He has won distinction for himself as a composer, many of his works having been played here by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He also has distinguished himself as having composed one of the most popular marches that it played at the Pops—the "Cruiser Harvard" march, which he wrote during the Spanish war, and which was played every night during that season.

Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach is 26 years old and one of the 'cellists of the orchestra. He was born in Grottkau, in Silesia, on Jan. 16, 1882. He is a graduate of the Hochschule in Berlin, where he was a pupil of Hausmann, and as 'cellist he has played in the principal orchestras of Berlin and Hamburg. He has had considerable experience as a conductor. He conducted his father's Philharmonic orchestra in Reichenbach, and he was conductor of the Berlin Dilettante orchestra, a semi-professional organization. The concerts, as usual, will be given on every weekday night, at 8 o'clock, and they will end about 11. The usual light refreshments will be served. The first programme is as follows:

TUESDAY, MAY 5.

Coronation march	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
Waltz Donauweibchen (first time)	Strauss
Selection, "La Boheme"	Puccini
Ballet music from "Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Berceuse for string orchestra	Strube
Humoreske (first time)	Dvorak
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Caprice Espagnol (first time)	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture, "Raymond"	A. Thomas
Selection, "The Red Mill"	Herbert
Waltz, "The Merry Widow"	Lehar
March, "Flag of Victory"	Blon

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE "POP" CONCERTS BEGIN ONCE MORE

Familiar Pleasures in the Familiar Way, with a Suggestion or Two That Might Increase Them—A Word About Mme. Nazimova's Play of "The Comet"—A Fresh Rumor of a Visit from Mr. Hammerstein—Discoveries About "Candida"—Another Maeterlinck Opera—Notes of the Day

The beginning of the "Pop" concerts, for a twenty-third spring, last evening in Symphony Hall, brought familiar pleasures to a familiar audience. On the stage sat the fifty-odd men of the Symphony Orchestra who make the band, and a band that every composer of light music envies when he hears it playing his own pieces. Five months ago, for example, a theatre orchestra, neither better nor worse than the average of its kind, was playing Mr. Herbert's music in "The Red Mill" as best it might. Last night came the inevitable "selection" from so popular a musical play, and the music semed born again. Mr. Herbert's melodies had their suavity or their piquancy; his rhythms tingled; his strokes of instrumentation told to the dullest ear. The audience heard the music as the composer imagined it and not as a company for "musical comedy" materializes it. No wonder the house applauded as though it were hearing a familar thing made new.

Again, Mr. Strube was conducing; again he had his orchestra well in hand; and again his finesse and sense of delicate tone helped such pretty trifles as his own "cradle song" or Dvorák's "Humoreske" or Adam's old overture, "If I Were King." He makes excellent play with brilliant ballet music like Ponchielli's in "La Gioconda" or with the swelling sonorities of the "Coronation March" in "The Prophet." Yet sometimes, as in Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" and in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," his pace was rather too slow for the full effectiveness of the music; and he has not the theatrical sense that dramatizes on the instant a "selection" from "La Bohéme" and makes it hit and bite. A "Pop" concert is a "Pop" concert, and the measure of conducting there is not so much its finer musical qualities as its alertness and effectiveness. The conductor must make the music that he is leading tell with his audience, and tell keenly, and that essential quality, Mr. Strube, practised hand as he is in such work, weakens by occasional slow pace and lack of incisive accent. He will not hit his music, and through it his audience, as hard as both need to be hit.

The programme, too, ran along familiar lines, and there were a dozen more for reading and reflection on the house bill. In the main there is no sufficient reason to quarrel with them. They give the public of "The Pops" what it expects and what for years past it has proved that it likes. No reasonable listener, after our fifty Symphony Concerts, would make these programme one white less light. Perhaps they might advisedly be further lightened by the inclusion of more orchestral trifles. Major and minor composers have written them in plenty; more or less such pieces must lie on the capacious shelves of the library of Symphony Hall, and most of them make their effect, with such an orchestra to play them, on the instant. Tschaikovski has written such pieces, for example, and they tell. Moreover, do the audiences at "The Pops" care as much for the old overtures "Raymonds" and all the rest—as the conductors fancy they do. Certainly the company last night heard the overture to Thomas's "Raymond" very placidly indeed. Surely there must be fresher and more interesting music that can be substituted for these stale mediocrities and that audiences would like for its freshness. However, it is not for the programmes, for the conductor or even for the orchestra, that the public of "The Pops" goes to Symphony Hall, and will go for two months to come. It is there for the pleasure of the hearing of music—we had almost written "any old music"—at its ease, to hear it through the fragrance of tobacco, with the soothing and the stimulus of the ready glass, to the accompaniment of light and random chat-

[199]

DR. KARL MUCK GIVES FAREWELL CONCERT

Closes His Work with Finish of Symphony Orchestra's 27th Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th and last concert of the 27th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. With this concert Dr. Karl Muck ended his engagement as conductor. The programme was the same as that chosen by him for his first concert in 1906:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner

It is not necessary in this report of the concert to dwell at length on the characteristics of Dr. Muck as a conductor or as a maker of programmes. The Herald gave editorial expression to its admiration for Dr. Muck as conductor and as man last Friday morning. The character of his programmes and the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the complaints recently made against them were discussed in The Herald last Sunday, and are again discussed elsewhere today.

Nor is it necessary to speak in detail of the conductor's interpretation and the orchestral performance of last night.

The compositions themselves were familiar to all concertgoers. It is enough to say that the interpretation of them revealed the qualities for which Dr. Muck is eminent, or, without exaggeration in speech, pre-eminent, and the orchestra shared with the conductor in the final triumph of an unusually brilliant season. It may, however, be said that seldom, if ever, has the finale of the fifth symphony been performed here in such a fully authoritative manner. For once it seemed superb from the beginning to the end, whereas under conductors of no mean parts, after the opening measures of pomp and jubilation, that which follows has often seemed lame and impotent.

The evening was one that Dr. Muck himself, accustomed as he is to gala nights, will long remember. Before the concert the orchestra gave him a loving cup. When he came upon the stage the great audience arose to welcome him while the orchestral honors of drums and trumpets voiced emphatically the feelings of those that stood and applauded. This applause was ever ready, after each movement, after each composition. And at the end Dr. Muck must have been deeply moved by the manifestations of admiration and affection.

Dr. Muck for two years has pronounced his own eulogy, modestly, unconsciously by the performances of the orchestra led by him. He, of all men, would dislike an enumeration of the qualities that distinguish him as musician and conductor. However eulogistic this catalogue of virtues would necessarily be, the formal statement would inevitably have the air of a thoughtfully prepared obituary article, and I believe that Dr. Muck is now at the beginning of a long career, one that will be even more glorious than the one that has already given him fame on two continents.

Yet a few words may now appropriately be said in taking leave of a conductor whose concerts have almost invariably been distinguished by breadth, brilliance and eloquence in the interpretation of compositions that called for intelligent sympathy and poetic understanding. It is not extravagant to say that as a conductor, Dr. Muck is myriad-minded. Whatever the nationality, the period, the school of the composer, he has endeavored, and with incredible success, to be at home in that composer's milieu and to assume his musical attitude.

The ability to put oneself in the place of another is a distinguishing mark of a general, orator, statesman, any leader of men, whose success must depend in large measure on the quickness and sureness with which he fathoms an opposing wish or mood and anticipates the purpose of another mind. Dr. Muck, as an interpreter, is not a ventriloquist that throws his own voice into inanimate figures. He finds the voice of each composer and it speaks through him.

His sympathy and appreciation are discriminative. Recognizing the better qualities of a composer, he exerts himself to put them fully in the light, nor does he attempt to give undue importance to that which is inherently commonplace. He is not a believer in plenary inspiration. If Haydn chatters gayly, he lets him chatter volubly and lightly to his heart's content. He does not seek to give incongruous depth to the classic serenity of Mozart, but he brings out the formal elegance of the wondrous boy so that it has the relief of a frieze.

In his treatment of modern music Dr. Muck does not expect a Russian or a Frenchman to express himself as a German of the old or the new school, and he, with his own keen sense of humor, relished the musical Americanisms of Mr. Chadwick's tramp and followed the adventures of that worthy with the utmost enjoyment.

And so Dr. Muck is more than the cosmopolite who is at home in various cities of the musical world; he is a dweller, not a sojourner; he has the racial instincts: he knows the colloquial speech as well as the language of the literature; he recognizes the smell of the soil.

There are other conductors that are exemplary disciplinarians; there are other conductors of poetic and imaginative force; but I know of no one who has this remarkable faculty of giving out the ideas of others with the utmost emphasis and eloquence of rhetoric and at the same time represses his own individuality.

It is this that sets Dr. Muck apart from other conductors of the first rank, and, I think, above them. Celebrated leaders have visited us and aroused enthusiasm by a concert or two. Dr. Muck has shown his ability week in and week out, and not by riding a favorite battle-horse to victory, but by mounting charger after charger, hitherto untried, almost or wholly unknown.

And he has done all this in public, with an air of scholarly ease and with a distinction of bearing that was courtly elegance. Never has he betrayed the consciousness of triumph. Never has he won applause by an exhibition of extravagance or by cheap appeal to sentimentalism.

He leaves us now full of honors to gain fresh triumphs. He leaves us with a host of grateful recollections, with the abiding memories of concerts of purest music performed in an ideal manner.

POPPING AT POP CONCERT START

Symphony Players Give Delightful Program While Waiters Bring Refreshments — Society Out in Force—Tuesday Tufts Night.

That most enjoyable of spring attractions, the "Pop" concert, arrived at Symphony Hall last night and was right heartily welcomed. The popularity of this typical Boston institution is proved by the fact that this is the twenty-third season, and, if that were not enough, by the fact that there was present last night a large and merry crowd. Gustav Strube conducted the big orchestra of Symphony men and there was music to please every taste, from Mr. Strube's own berceuse for string orchestra along through marches and overtures down to the catchy, up-to-date strains of "The Red Mill" and "The Merry Widow." And those who hold that music goes best with a glass on the table had no reason to complain. The Pop program is generous, but the Pop refreshment card is positively Falstaffian.

Those who take the "Pops" seriously found pleasure enough last night in the three hours' musical performance, four numbers to the hour, with short intermissions at 9 and 10 o'clock. Mr. Strube—and later Mr. Kautzenbach, whose youth belies his experience—can be trusted to make up a tempting program. And those who come chiefly to look on must also have gone home well pleased, for young society was there in parade attire, and the display of hats and gowns was beautiful enough to satisfy the most captious feminine critic.

So it was a gala occasion for the devotees of both music and millinery. As Bill Taft would say, it filled the measure of eye and ear; and with the castanets clacking on the stage and the corks popping down below, who was there with soul so dead as to think of tariff revision or the currency question?

The "Pops" will run nightly, except Sunday, well into June, with a guarantee of a superabundant supply of everything the Popsters like. Off and on there will be the usual special night. For instance, next Tuesday will be Tufts night, and the brown and blue will have the right of way.

SOCIETY OUT IN FORCE FOR FIRST CONCERT

Society turned out handsomely for the Pop first night and interest centered chiefly on Harold Bauer, who was with Professor and Mrs. George Chadwick and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Lowell Mason (Estelle Kimball); on Mrs. John L. Gardner, who wore an odd jacket made of East Indian white lace heavily spangled and beaded, and on Mrs. Gordon Dexter, who arrived quite late and created something of a sensation. She wore a dull green velvet, her white hair topped with a large black hat with nodding plumes.

Among the beauties present were Mary Desmond of London, wearing a pale blue empire gown and French hat in which blue and white lace prevailed; Mrs. Eben S. Stanwood (Gladys Lawson) and Marion Lawson, her sister.

Seen here and there were Mr. and Mrs. Hunt (Helen Allen), Col. and Mrs. John Curtin, guests of the Lelands of Brookline; Hon. Joshua Holden, with his daughters, Mrs. George Mumford (nee Lee), very pretty in heliotrope chiffon; Dr. Elizabeth A. Riley of Bay State road, and party; Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, Mr. F. H. Byrne and party, Mrs. Frederick Comee with friends, Mrs. Ehrlich (nee Hecht) and party, Mr. Gott, Mr. Swift, John Thomas, Professor Louis Elson, Mrs. Joseph Warren (Constance Williams), Ida Vose with jolly party, and many more—the capacity of the hall being tested. June 8 is "Harvard night."

JOURNAL ARTIST'S IMPRESSIONS AT POP CONCERT SEASON OPENING LAST NIGHT

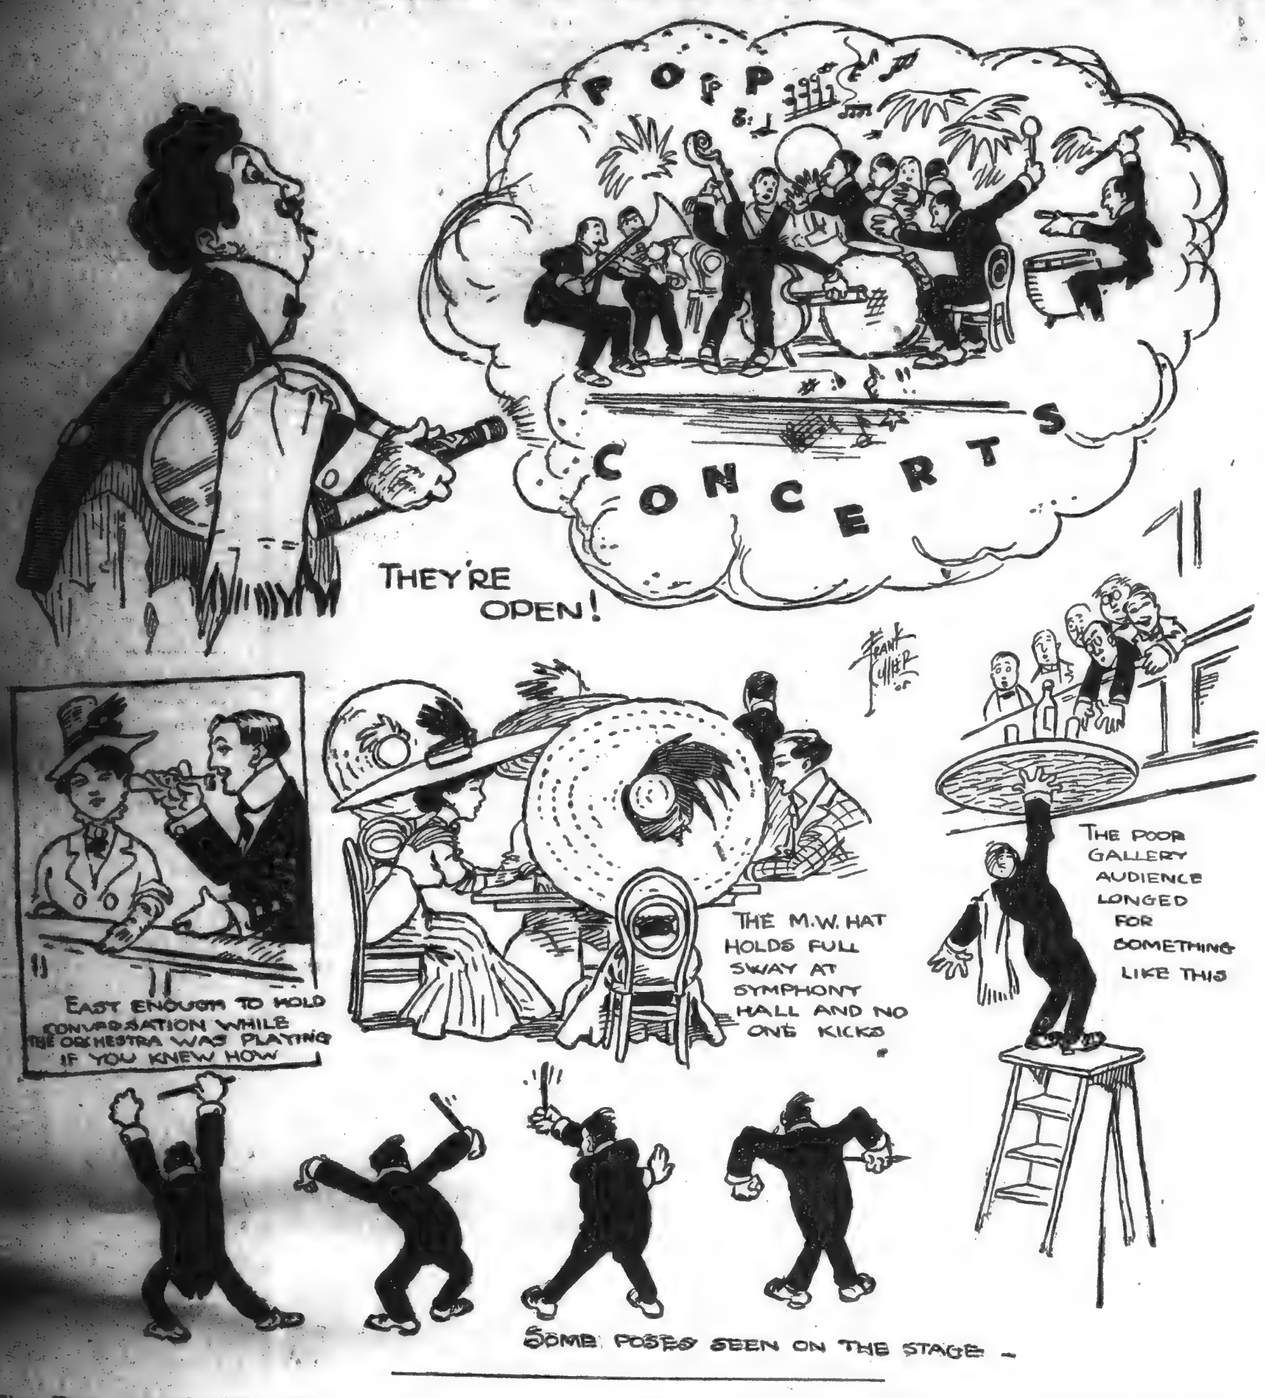
ARGUES AGA RAILROAD

Ex-Secretary Elwyn Chamber of Com Policy of New Hearing Befo

The New merger car from the day, wh heard again

T E

ONCE MORE THE POPS, JOYOUS AND MELODIOUS AND BRILLIANT AS EVER



The Pops opened their 23d season last night in Symphony hall, the number of years in this case having no mystic significance whatever. The concerts have long ago earned the title they assume, and last night was only the beginning of another enjoyable season.

The audience was the familiar mixture of extreme dressiness and carefree workaday clothes. Everything goes at the Pops, and everybody goes too. There were musical people ranging from the Symphony orchestra players saying goodby, on through composers, society musicians and critics; there were society people pure and simple,—this being Boston—and there were business men staying in town for a cool and pleasant evening with the Princess Nicotine, the Queen Malt and the Goddess of Music. Mostly they had their own goddesses with them also.

It may be remarked that the merry widow was present in all widths. There was also a tendency noticeable to put most of the overhang aft, and to shorten the lines forward till the craft had the air of rising to a continual wave. The white shirtwaist was there, and eke its silken sister; and as to the really dressy gowns—mere man could but gasp and admire without analysis. They looked expensive, however.

The season is shorter than usual this year; ordinarily there are eight weeks, but this year the National federation of women's clubs has secured the hall for the latter end of June, and only seven weeks of Pops can be allowed. This makes larger audiences while they last entirely probable.

Last night every table was occupied, and the balcony and gallery were also fully populated. There was a noticeable interest in the music for the music's sake; the pops are no longer merely a place to spend a social evening when the band isn't playing. A splendid program was offered by Mr Strube, who conducts for the first part of the season; familiar pieces and old favorites alternate with new offerings, demanding neither too strict attention nor a forgetting. The two new pieces were a Dvorak "humoreske" which was perfectly beautiful, but so plaintive that one wondered where it got its title, and a "Caprice Espagnol" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which was a very Russian idea of Spanish expression, beginning with a tremendous roll of drums and a bugle flourish.

The evening began with the good old "Coronation" march of Meyerbeer, and continued with the equally well-loved Pop piece, "Si J'Etais Roi" of Adam. Then came the first of the "first time at the Pops" numbers, the Strauss "Donauweibchen" waltz. It is a Strauss waltz, and beyond that all that can be said of it is that it is a Straussy-Strauss waltz. It makes one want to float, and swing, and glide, and dream. And Mr Strube's players made one want to do these things even more than the composer.

The ballet music from Ponchielli's "Gioconda" started the second brace of the program; Mr Strube's own cradle song for the strings was bracketed with the Dvorak number, and the overture to "Rienzi" with the Russian-Spanish number concluded that part.

There was a noticeable effort to put some of the better music in the last third of the program, which last night began with the overture "Raymond." In the programs for a week or two ahead, which are always provided at these concerts, the same tendency is noticeable. The idea seems to be to keep the musical people as long as possible now, instead of driving them away in favor of those who like selections from "The Girl from Paris" or "The Belle of New York." And the audience stayed almost to a man.

To be sure, it was hopeless to expect the first evening of the Pops to pass away this year without hearing the "Merry Widow" waltz. Sure enough it was there, and all the hats tried not to look self-conscious. The thing was helped by the fact that no man knows yet for sure what a Merry Widow hat is, exactly and definitely.

Tonight's program is another enjoyable one. It reads as follows:

German march.....Strube
Overture, Merry Wives of Windsor....Niccolai
Selection, Rigoletto.....Verdi
Scenes pittoresques.....Massenet
Hungarian rhapsody No. 2.....Liszt
Ballet suite from Midsummer.....A Maquarre
(First time.)
(a) Mermaid's dance.
(b) Pantomime.
(c) Scotch dance.
Selection, Madam Butterfly.....Puccini
Overture, Jeanne d'Arc.....Converse
(First time.)
Fire charm from The Valkyries.....Wagner
Selection, Mlle Modiste.....Herbert
Waltz, Fideles Wien.....Komzak
March, King Karl.....Unrath

'POPS' COME AGAIN TO SYMPHONY HALL

Floor and Balcony Filled on Opening Night of These May-June Functions.

GUSTAV STRUBE WIELDS BATON WITH RARE SKILL

Puccini, Strauss and Wagner Share Honors with Lehar —Brilliant Gowns.

Gustav Strube,
Composer Who Is the Leader of Big Orchestra at the "Pops."

Witching effects of "flute, violin, bassoon," 50 bows moving as one, a conductor to the baton born, and 2000 people listening to choice music—this in brief is the story of the opening of the "Pops" last night, in Symphony Hall.

One of the biggest gatherings ever seen at these popular entertainments—floor fully occupied and balconies filled—it was also one of the most picturesque. Bright-hued women's gowns made it a spectacle, and enthusiastic applause helped to make it a success. Something of the boisterous fun of "college nights" was absent, but the occasional outbreak of corks consoled those present for the deprivation. All through it was a sociable audience.

Meanwhile, Conductor Strube held seriously to his task, wielding his army with a result which no peace society would have had the heart to disapprove. There were 12 numbers in all, and into two hours his musicians compressed bits of Meyerbeer, Adam, Strauss, Puccini, Dvorak, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakoff. The waltzes, with "The Merry Widow" strongly in evidence, touched the crowd into dancing humor.

Edgewise as it were, the conductor had got into his programme a "berceuse" of his own composition, and when his string regiment dropped their bows after the dainty piece had been played through, the audience enthusiastically applauded. There were several redemands during the programme; after each of them Herr Strube smilingly acknowledged his indebtedness. But he went on all the same with his plan of campaign, and this was why his trained musical battalions were enabled to perform their closing march and fling out "The Flag of Victory" at the hour preordained for the close of the entertainment.

Credit for the perfect arrangements which made it an ideal "Pops" night, the augury of many similar evenings yet to come during the season, is due to Manager C. A. Ellis and to his assistant, F. R. Comee.

The programme was as follows:

Coronation march.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi".....Adam
Waltz, "Donauweibchen" (first time)..Strauss
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Ballet music from "Gioconda"....Ponchielli
(a) Berceuse for string orchestra.....Strube
(b) Humoreske (first time).....Dvorak
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Caprice Espagnol (first time).....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture, "Raymond".....A. Thomas
Selection, "The Red Mill".....Herbert
Waltz, "The Merry Widow".....Lehar
March, "Flag of Victory".....Bion

[201]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

MONDAY, MAY 4, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE YEAR

The Incidents of Dr. Muck's Leave-Taking in a Programme That Was a Little Epitome of His Own Traits as a Conductor and the New Qualities He Has Infused Into the Band—A Suggestion for Next Season—"Way Down East" in London—A Queer Little English Play—The Hess-Schroder Quartet Completed—Bernhardt and America—A Visit from Siegfried Wagner—Other News of the Day

Dr. Muck's leave-taking, at the final Symphony concert of Saturday evening, was surely after his own heart. His men gave him a loving-cup in the seclusion of the orchestra room before the beginning of the concert, in intimate, and not in ceremonious, fashion. For two years conductor and band had worked together; and the work had brought a warmer liking and a closer tie between the chief and his men than any previous conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed. The cup was the token of this personal relationship and the place to give and to receive it was a public and not a private place. Again, no feminizing and pretty flowers and greenery decorated the conductor's stand. Instead, a sober and masculine wreath of laurel hung in more fitting token from it. The orchestra, when Dr. Muck first appeared on the stage, rose to its feet, and saluted him with a long flourish of trumpets and drums—the "tusch" of orchestral ceremony in Germany. The audience was on its feet as well, and for some minutes the conductor stood, as it were, between the applause of his hearers and the applause of his men. He received it with quiet tokens of answering feeling, but without the slightest suggestion of personal triumph. Again, at the end of Beethoven's symphony, which stood first on the programme, the audience renewed its applause; but the conductor, quite as though he was in the routine of the season, called the band to its feet to share it. At the end of the concert, the audience lingered for two or three recalls, but Dr. Muck was plainly disinclined to prolong the leave-taking. The spirit of it on both sides had already spoken fully, clearly, sincerely.

In itself, the concert was a fitting and sufficient epitome of the traits of Dr. Muck's conducting and of the new qualities that he has infused into the orchestra. Its playing, alike in Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and in the three pieces from Wagner —the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" —that made the rest of the programme, had the ardor and brilliancy, the elasticity and freedom, the masculinity and intensity of voice, to which Dr. Muck has brought the band. The richness of its tone, the magnificence of its sonorities, the smoothness and evenness of its phrasing, the energy or the delicacy of its accent as occasion bade; above all, its power not merely to make an effective or an adroit stroke, but to create and sustain a musical and poetic mood were at their fullest, warmest and clearest. It was the playing of an orchestra to whom its conductor had imparted his own quick and nervous susceptibilities and his own cool and ordered control of them. In the symphony Dr. Muck conducted with a truly superb largeness of design, wealth of understanding, and sustained eloquence of utterance that made Beethoven's music epic again. In it played the nobler, the loftier side of the conductor's imagination when exaltation is upon him. Then, forthwith, with the versatile completeness of sympathetic and imparting understanding that is his peculiar trait in his art, he clothed Wagner's "Faust" overture with its moods of romantic gloom and romantic aspiration, its energy and its torture of musical speech. No less he wrought the delicate instrumental traceries, the pretty sentimental felicities of "A Siegfried Idyl." Even in the great spaces of Symphony Hall, with 2000 listeners to hear what Wagner intended for his wife's ears, the music kept its air of intimacy. Then, for ending, and for glorious and summing ending, came the thrilling prelude to "The Mastersingers" with Dr. Muck weaving all its intricacies and convolutions into what seemed a sustained burst of orchestral song, and song ardent with the beauty, the power, the passion of sound, and still more with the vigor, the joy and the zest of doing and living—the doing and the living, and their rewards, that are in store alike for Dr. Muck, as he goes, and to the orchestra that he leaves.

H. T. P.

Looking Forward

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Now that arrangements are being made for the coming Symphony Concerts, it might be well to mention what seems, from several points of view, a very short-sighted policy on the part of the management. It seems an outrage to ask those students who cannot afford to buy season tickets for the Symphony Concerts to arrive two hours early, only to stand in line, often in the snow and rain, in order to gain admission to the gallery. The Chicagoans are much more considerate of their students, and it is possible for them to buy gallery tickets a week in advance, and students attending the Friday afternoon or the Saturday night concerts can buy tickets for the following week's concert. In inclement weather the gallery at our Symphony Hall is often not nearly filled, while the gallery of Orchestra Hall in Chicago is always fully occupied, even in bad weather. Hence it would seem that both the management of Symphony Hall and the public would profit by the adoption of the Chicago system since the inconvenience and possible danger of braving the elements for hours at a stretch (our Boston weather being what it is) would be removed and all seats filled preciation in the gallery.

ELSIE G. PHELAN

Boston, May 2.

[The objection, of course, to the sale in advance of the tickets to the secondb alcony at the afternoon concerts is the fact, proved by experience, that ticket speculators and brokers buy them and sell them again at prices that put them beyond the means of those for whom they are intended. The management of the Symphony Orchestra has considered the whole matter often, and no other method than that which it follows at present seems so likely to keep the tickets for the second balcony on Fridays in the hands of those for whom they are designed and at the nominal price for which they are sold. Editor, Transcript].

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 6, 1908

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE "POP" CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL.

The Symphonies are ended,
The Summer days have come.
Herr Doktor Muck's departed,
All criticism is dumb.

Lay by the active pencil,
The metaphors sublime,
The Programmes analytic,
Unchain the Muse of Rhyme.

No more Debussy puzzles,
Or D'Indy woes severe.
Herr Strube takes the baton,
The waiter brings the beer.

And Ellis, Comee, Mudgett,
Stand smiling at the door.
The "Pops" are now beginning,
The Winter's task is o'er.

We still have our "Tannhauser,"
But amputate the "T,"
And still our old orchestra
Through a glass darkly see.

Some of the numbers given
Were not unknown to fame,
We found the best among them
Puccini's "La Boheme."

Strube's own composition,
A light Berceuse for strings,
Ought to be mentioned also
Among the better things.

And Dvorak's "Humoreske,"
Not humorous a bit,
Was also on the programme,
And also made a hit.

Even "The Merry Widow"
Was represented there,
And also old "Rienzi"
With its eternal prayer.

And Strauss was on the programme,
But not the wicked Dick
Who pitched into our country
And gave New York "Old Nick!"

Symphony Hall was crowded,
To every one's delight.
Strube was much applauded,
The "Pops" began last night.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON POST, WEDNESDAY, MAY 6, 1908

THRONG OUT AT THE "POPS"

Society was well represented at the opening "Pop" concert held last evening in Symphony Hall. Not only was the gathering a very select one, but a large one as well, there being scarcely a seat available when the orchestra played the opening number.

Mr. Gustav Strube was the conductor. Never since his first appearance before a Boston audience in 1898 have Mr. Strube's efforts evoked more applause. His berceuse, for string orchestra, was well received and introduced new ideas as to the conception of the leader's ability as a composer.

La Boheme, by Puccini, proved as great a favorite as ever to musical Bostonians.

Owing to the convention of the Federation of Women's Clubs to be held in Symphony Hall the latter part of June, the concerts will not run as late in the season as has been the custom. The season of "Pops" will last seven weeks instead of the usual eight or nine and will close June 20.

TRAVELER

MAY 6, 1908.

STRUBE OPENS 'POP' CONCERT SEASON HERE

Conductor of Symphony Is Greeted by Care-Free Audience.

The 23d session of the "pop" concerts by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened last night at Symphony Hall. Gustave Strube conducted. There was a large and enthusiastic audience, especially fervid in its applause when the orchestra played a selection from "The Red Mill."

A "pop" concert can be defined variously. Primarily, it is a place where one can hear really good music by one of the best orchestras in the country, at popular prices. More detailed, it is a place where one can loll back and smoke one's cigar and sip a glass of claret and seltzer, or something else, and hear Wagner and Beethoven sandwiched in between Herbert, where one can hear the Merry Widow waltz and see the Merry Widow hat.

One can go to a "pop" concert in a business suit and not be stared at. They are informal, enjoyable and altogether just the right thing. And the orchestra will play every night, except Sundays, from now on for a month or more.

The programme last night was indicative of the nature of those to come, and included two popular overtures, a sweet little berceuse for muted strings written by Mr. Strube himself, the inevitable Straus waltz, an operatic selection and a freaky thing rightly called a Spanish caprice which plunged the strings into a hysteria of harmonics and kept the wood winds and reeds skipping over dancing cadenzas.

Really, the opening concert was a replica of those that have gone before. The orchestra can have nothing said about it than has been said, the crowd was the same old "pop" crowd—merry, care free, the women there to look pretty and to be entertained by the men, and the men there willing and eager to do their best to make it pleasant for the women.

The genuine music lovers were there, too.

GUNTS MAN.

[202]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
THURSDAY. MAY 7, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MR. PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Pianist to Return Next Winter for the Performance of His New Symphony or, Possibly, of a New Concerto—Dr. Muck's Departure and a Clear Statement as to the Possibilities of His Return—The "Soloists" at the Symphony Concerts Next Year—Mme. Nordica Engaged for the Boston Opera and Mr. Russell's Summer Plans for It—New Music at the Second "Pop" Concert—Caruso as the Middle West Hears and Sees Him—More About the New Harvard Dramatic Club—"The Man of the Hour" Near the End of Its Stay—Mr. Craig's Plans for the Castle Square—Mr. Belasco Engages Mrs. Campbell

Before Mr. Paderewski left New York on Tuesday, on his return to Europe he made a tentative agreement with the mangement of the Symphony Orchestra to return to Boston for a brief visit next winter. Then he expects to have fully and finally completed the revision of the symphony which he has long had in hand. It will be played for the first times, from the manuscript score, at a pair of Symphony Concerts here, and subsequently in New York and, perhaps, in other cities that the orchestra visits. At the same concerts Mr. Paderewski will appear as a pianist and according to his final words on the pier, as his ship was sailing, he expects to have finished a new concerto of his own in time for his visit to America next winter. Thus, if present anticipations are fulfilled, we are likely to hear in the next series of Symphony Concerts a new symphony or a new concerto by Mr. Paderewski, and possibly both, with the pianist himself come to hear the one and play the other. He will remain only a short time in Ameica, and the present plans for his visit do not contemplate any recitals.

Dr. Muck is going from Boston to New York today, and next Tuesday he sails from the latter city on his way to Germany to take up his work again as a conductor of opera at Berlin and at Baireuth. To repeat once more an authoritative statement as to the possibilities of his return to Boston as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for a long term: There is no arrangement whatever for the future between Dr. Muck and the management of the orchestra. The management, like the public of the Symphony Concerts here and elsewhere, would be glad to have Dr. Muck as the conductor of the orchestra again. He himself, as his present feelings are, is willing to return to the post, which he has liked more and more as he has continued in it. But, as he himself has also said to his friends here: "The matter is not in his hands." Dr. Muck is under contract to the Royal Opera at Berlin as one of its conductors. That theatre, for several years to come, has full right to his services, and it is an old story that the emperor and his court, the management and the public hold him in very high esteem. What the future may hold as to this contract, what it may bring after the contract has expired, neither Dr. Muck nor the management of the Symphony Orchestra, nor any one else, can now know or even safely conjecture. Long ago Dr. Muck acquired the comfortable wisdom that takes life and the day's work as they come.

For the time, therefore, the orchestra is Mr. Fiedler's, and he enters upon his work at the beginning of next October. Except in the return of Mr. Hess as concert master and in a successor to Mr. Czerwonky at the first desk of the violins, the personnel of the orchestra will be virtually the same as it has been in the season now ended. Next year, moreover, the management will continue its present policy as to "assisting artists," and the more assuredly as the experience of the past two seasons has justified it. The "soloists" will be singers or virtuosi of high rank, and the object in the engagement of them will be quality and not numbers. Presumably the singers will come from opera houses, and the pianists and the violinists from the visiting virtuosi whom next season promises in plenty.

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND